14. Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

19. Rev. Ian Paisley asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the current state of security in Northern Ireland.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Since I last answered questions in the House on 13 June two police officers have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province. The Provisional IRA claimed responsibility for both murders. I know the House will join me in condemning these brutal murders and expressing our sympathy and sorrow to the families of the bereaved.

So far this year 275 people have been charged with serious offences, including 21 with murder and 26 with attempted murder, and 116 weapons, 6,021 rounds of ammunition and 4,010lb of explosives have been recovered. The explosive devices neutralised since 13 June included an 1,800lb bomb dismantled by the security forces in Newry on 2 July.

Mr. Proctor: My right hon. Friend will be aware that in the aftermath of the security incidents to which he referred there have been disturbing reports of cuts in police resources. Will he assure the House that no cuts have been made and that, although a limit has been imposed on the amount of overtime worked by the Royal Ulster Constabulary, the total number of police man-hours worked by the RUC has been maintained?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, Sir. Overtime is a bad guide. The RUC and its full-time reserve is now reaching a strength of 11,000 and has doubled in little more than nine years. The total number of man-hours worked by full-time officers during 1984-85, which is the best indicator of police effort, rose to its highest ever figure of 23·1 million hours.

Mr. Yeo: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the new extradition treaty with the United States represents a significant blow to IRA terrorists who may be looking for a bolt hole?

Mr. Hurd: Yes. The new supplementary treaty which we have negotiated and which will soon, I hope, be coming before the United States Senate and this House will be a substantial help to us in dealing with terrorism, particularly in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Molyneaux: In view of the indispensable role of the part time element of the Ulster Defence Regiment, will the Secretary of State advise his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to maintain the part-time element at its present establishment?

Mr. Hurd: The exact figures and deployment are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and the General Officer Commanding, but I have made clear from time to time, including in this House, the importance that I attach to the continued existence of the UDR.

Mr. William Ross: Given that the Secretary of State has to exercise a political judgment whenever we are faced with the problem of the routeing or the banning of parades which have an impact on the security situation, will he tell the House why it is that his political judgment has now created a situation in which there is disruption between those who normally support the police and the police force?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on a point of fact. I do not exercise a political judgment about the route of marches, nor have my predecessors. The law places that operational responsibility upon the police. That is how it is being handled this year, as in past years.

Rev. Ian Paisley: What progress has been made concerning the murder of 69 Protestants in County Fermanagh, for which no one has been made amenable in law?

Mr. Hurd: The figures for those convicted of terrorist offences in the Province as a whole this year so far show a marked increase on the figures for last year. There is always difficulty in bringing terrorists to justice. That is one reason why we are anxious to build up our security co-operation with the Republic and the United States, which was referred to in an earlier supplementary question. There are continuing real difficulties in bringing to justice those guilty of terrorist murder, but the figures show that we are tackling that problem.

Mr. Nicholson: Will the Secretary of State tell the House what progress he has made in improving the conditions in border police stations, especially for the RUC personnel going to and coming from those police stations?

Mr. Hurd: There is a large spending programme designed to do that. It is designed to catch up with the backlog of work created by the rapid expansion of the RUC, for which I have already given the figures. We have some way to go, including in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, before we can be satisfied with the outcome. As he will know, in Newry in particular and other border areas, a good deal of work is going on.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my right hon. Friend accept the terrible depression felt on both sides of the House, and indeed in the country, as more and more police are assassinated by the IRA? Does my right hon. Friend agree that we regularly see a shocking chronicle of photographs in the police magazine each month? Would it not be helpful to publicise those photographs in American magazines and daily newspapers to show the tragic way in which many brave members of the RUC have been murdered?

Mr. Hurd: That is a useful idea. It is very important that Americans, and particularly Irish Americans, realise that if they contribute funds that find their way into the pockets of the IRA, they are contributing to the murder overwhelmingly of Irishmen, particularly the gallant police officers to whom my hon. Friend referred.

Mr. Archer: Does the Secretary of State understand that the one proposition on which both traditions in Northern Ireland are agreed is that the authorities are incapable of making a decision and seeing it through? The bullying and violence are effective because Governments respond to them. I appreciate the difficult matters of judgment with which the police are being confronted, but will the Secretary of State urge upon senior police officers the fact that people in both traditions will watch events tomorrow and over the weekend to see whether lawlessness and the threat of lawlessness will pay off, and that the Government and the Opposition will give them every support in resisting it?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The RUC is well aware of the point that he makes. The Chief Constable and his colleagues have my full support in the difficult decisions that they continue to have to make.

Marches (Government Policy)

3. Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will now make a definitive statement of Government policy on marches in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: The Government recognise the right of people in Northern Ireland to parade peacefully. Many such parades are held each year with no significant risk to public order. But a few are deliberately provocative and calculated to cause trouble, and others can cause difficulty because of the preferred route. In such circumstances, it is for the police to discuss the route with the organisers and if necessary for the police to order a change in the route on public order grounds. That is a decision for the RUC alone. If after considering the advice of the police it appears to me that, with or without re-routeing, a parade is likely to cause serious public disorder, I may ban it. I fully support the Chief Constable's approach and I urge those who are involved in organising these parades to co-operate with the police and, of course, to obey the law.

Mr. Bell: We welcome the Secretary of State's definitive policy on that issue and the fact that there is a mix of political judgment and operational responsibility. The difference between the two has given the impression, as we have seen today, that the Government are dithering on the issue. We are grateful for that explanation of the Government's policy. However, can the Secretary of State give us any idea of the magnitude of police resources that have to be committed to controlling marches and parades in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. During 1984 there were more than 2,240 parades, at which some 39,000 police officers were deployed. The estimated cost of that policing effort was more than £2 million.

Rev. Ian Paisley: In the light of the statement that the right hon. Gentleman has just made, will he explain why on 3 February, 5 May, 15 May, 16 May and 23 June this year there were five illegal Sinn Fein/IRA parades through Toomebridge, yet no action was taken? At that time a shot was fired from the hotel, but because of the thinness of the police on the ground, the police were held back by an unruly mob, and it was only later that the gun that was used to fire at the police was recovered.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that these matters come under the enforcement of the law and are for the RUC to deal with. I am sure that he has already given his version of the events of those days, or has encouraged other witnesses to give their versions, to the RUC.

Mr. Hume: Does the Secretary of State agree that the police handling of parades in Northern Ireland at present reveals many contradictions in policy? For example, why is it right to re-route a parade in Portadown tomorrow and on Saturday, whereas it was wrong to re-route last Sunday? Why was it right to prevent an Orange parade going through a Catholic housing estate in Cookstown last week, and why will it be allowed to go through that estate tomorrow? Why is it right to ban a parade in Castlewellan —and rightly so—because it is 95 per cent. Catholic, but not to do so in Pomeroy, which is also 95 per cent. Catholic? What is the basis on which these decisions are taken? Is it, as it should be, the susceptibilities of citizens along the route, or is it simply a question of which side will cause the most trouble, which is how it appears? If that is the policy, that is surrendering the ground to the men of violence on all sides.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's question illustrates one of the difficulties. People in both communities sometimes find it difficult to recognise a reasonable compromise when they see one. The RUC must make decisions on re-routeing place by place and parade by parade after taking account of all the local factors. That is what it is doing, and it is increasingly recognised that the RUC is handling the situation with much common sense.

Mr. Stephen Ross: I support the comments made earlier from the Opposition Front Bench, but should not the message go out from both sides of the House that those responsible for organising marches in Northern Ireland, from whichever side they come, should abide by the decisions of the RUC and the Chief Constable? If necessary, the Secretary of State should tell them that that is what we expect this coming weekend.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The more I listen to views, particularly private views, on this subject, the more sure I become that in Northern Ireland it is possible to celebrate a battle or a tradition without provoking or humiliating those who do not belong to that tradition. That must be the right way to handle the matter.

Mr. Proctor: When my right hon. Friend defended the highlighting of re-routeing the last time he answered Northern Ireland questions, he referred to the amount of police time used to protect marches which could have been released for other security functions. Following the highlighting of re-routeing, has police time involved in marching activities increased or decreased?

Mr. Hurd: I gave the very substantial figures for last year. If, when the Chief Constable re-routes a parade or, as in the case of Castlewellan, I ban it, and the organisers in some way defy that, police resources must then be deployed to apply the law. The right answer is for the police and the organisers to reach agreement on a sensible route. That is done in a very large number of cases, and when that happens police resources and the expenditure on policing such a parade are greatly reduced.

Mr. McCusker: Will the Secretary of State bear in mind that when the men of north Armagh tomorrow try to walk into Portadown over the route which they and their forefathers have traversed since 1796, they will be motivated not by any desire to break the laws of their country but by a sense of historic necessity to express, as they have always done, their legitimate pride in the possession of their lands and liberties? They know instinctively that they survive only by their solidarity and determination. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that unless that is understood, the people who will be dealt with tomorrow will be dealt with, not in a manner likely to maintain the peace, but in one likely to lead to a breach of it?

Mr. Hurd: Solidarity and determination are admirable qualities, but if the hon. Gentleman is saying that they can be expressed in Northern Ireland or in Portadown only by the attempt to assert, against the law, the traditional route which originally ran through green fields and now runs past houses occupied almost overwhelmingly by Catholics, he is making a case that is incomprehensible, to use a mild word, everywhere outside the Unionist community?

Mr. Flannery: Does the Minister agree that if we all insisted on doing precisely what our forefathers had done, all kinds of frightening things would be happening in the world? Does he remember that when I spoke in the debate on the renewal of the emergency provisions I pleaded with the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) not to engage in these provocations? Is it not a fact that when a leading figure makes it clear that there is an issue at stake in whether a parade goes through an area and then provokes the people in that area, the Member concerned is deliberately trying to provoke trouble when we are trying to stop it?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will apply the same morals and lessons to those whose company he frequents and favours in the North. The respect for the law, the sensitivities, the rights and the lives of others whom he exemplified in his question is not always evident in their actions.

Mr. Beggs: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the sight of a Union flag, a poppy or any other expression of British identity is seen as provocative by many supporters of the SDLP and Sinn Fein? Does he recognise that the banning or re-routing of traditional, Orange and Loyalist peaceful parades can contribute only to the establishment of anti-British ghettos, where the forces of the Crown are unwelcome and people are unable to express their loyalty to the constitution and the Crown?

Mr. Hurd: One of the problems is that there are many symbols in Northern Ireland and many people in both communities who are determined to provoke and be provoked. However, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman, with his record and his view, believes that Northern Ireland can make progress out of its many difficulties if, in either community, it is felt that the only way to preserve identity or solidarity is to do and say things designed to humiliate others.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Do the figures which the Secretary of State has given us show how much police time was involved in dealing with parades that were not notified? Is any record kept of unnotified parades? Will he acknowledge that the interference of self-appointed protectors outwith the United Kingdom have done more than anything else to inflame the attitude of Loyalists, at this time of the year, towards parades?

Mr. Hurd: I understand that point. I do not have the figures for which the hon. Gentleman asked. By definition, it is difficult to have figures on meetings or gatherings that are not notified, but I shall look into the matter.

Terrorism (Evidential Proof)

4. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consideration he has given to the difficulties faced by the Royal Ulster Constabulary in obtaining evidential proof sufficient to satisfy the courts of the guilt of individuals believed by the police to be involved in terrorist activities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): My right hon. Friend and I are aware of the difficulties which the Royal Ulster Constabulary has in obtaining such evidence, but we remain convinced that it is right that alleged terrorists should be brought before the courts for trial against an evidential standard of "proof beyond reasonable doubt".

Mr. Maginnis: Is the Minister telling us that he will take no new steps to ensure that known terrorists do not continue to avoid justice in Ulster, are able to continue their murder on our streets and, indeed, to bring murder to the streets of Great Britain, as some recently have intended? Does the Minister admit that since the Bennett report that which in Great Britain has been accepted as a normal interpretation has been substituted in Ulster for a process more akin to the cosy interview?

Mr. Scott: I do not agree with that last comment. The figures given by my right hon. Friend earlier show the success which the security forces have had in arresting and charging people and bringing them before the courts. We must understand that terrorists are determined to undermine law and order. That is their principal objective. If we move away from strict standards in enforcing the law we shall be doing their job for them.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. Friend accept that as surely as night follows day the House will in the fullness of time have the common sense to reintroduce capital punishment for terrorism in response to public demand? When that day comes, will it not be necessary to ensure that the people concerned have a proper trial? Is my hon. Friend aware that nothing will convince me that those who have escaped from the Maze prison have not struck and killed again?

Mr. Scott: On recent evidence I see no possibility that the House will be prepared to reintroduce capital punishment for murder, even for terrorist offences. To give a personal view, I do not believe that its reintroduction would increase stability in Northern Ireland.

Lear Fan Project

5. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement about the winding-up of the Lear Fan project.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): Since the events described in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Arnold) on 3 June, the company has filed under the appropriate United States bankruptcy code and the United States courts have appointed an interim trustee to administer the company's assets in the United States.

The receiver appointed by Her Majesty's Government has not yet completed his review and assessment of the assets of the company. Until he has, it will not be possible to estimate how much might be recovered.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: From that answer, should I conclude that something might be salvaged from the company's liquidation? In view of the large sums of public money lost in De Lorean and now in Lear Fan, what lessons can be drawn from these unhappy stories, and in particular how can we improve monitoring the use of public money?

Dr. Boyson: About £4 million was saved through the company going into liquidation at that time. We trust that more will be saved. That money would have been spent if the company had continued to trade.

Mr. Skinner: The old story.

Dr. Boyson: It is a new story as well as an old story, and the hon. Gentleman should listen to the new story. Any Government of any colour investing in Northern Ireland must make two decisions about helping companies from abroad. The first is to assess how much private money is involved or whether it will all come from Government.

Mr. Skinner: Market forces.

Dr. Boyson: If the hon. Gentleman will listen, he will hear about market forces. At first Lear Fan operated largely with Government money, then, for every £2 of private money, £1 of Government money was used. At the end all the money was private. It is vital for more private money to be invested at the beginning of such projects.

We should be careful when dealing with risk enterprises at the frontiers of technology which no one wants to back in their countries of origin. We should look for blue chip companies which already have good products. That is what we want in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not the appalling unacceptable embarrassing, unpalatable and terrible truth that violence does pay in Northern Ireland when Governments insist in backing projects such as Lear Fan and De Lorean for which no commercial plan works? Is it not about time that the Government reviewed their policy? Why has the Minister refused, despite repeated requests from the Opposition, to come to the Dispatch Box to make a full statement and to stand hon. Members' questioning? After all, £50 million of public money is involved.

Dr. Boyson: I enjoyed the exercise in adjectives at the beginning of the hon. Gentleman's question. He certainly deserves a CSE grade 1. The answer to the second part of his supplementary question is that much Government money has helped companies, including—in the far past—when the Labour party was last in office. That has continued under the present Government, and about three quarters of new jobs in Northern Ireland last year resulted from the activities of companies owned abroad which had been encouraged by the Government of Northern Ireland to invest in the Province.

Mr. Couchman: Will my hon. Friend reassure the House that, notwithstanding the polemics of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), his Department will not lose sight of the fact that money will have to continue to be poured into Northern Ireland's industry to regenerate the economy there and to provide the employment which will, more certainly than anything else, take the gunmen off the streets?

Dr. Boyson: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is vital that outside investment comes into Northern Ireland. It is similarly vital that small businesses there should grow, and we shall give every encouragement to that. I remind the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that a reduction in violence encourages people to invest in the Province.

Mr. Bell: Has the Minister been able to resolve the question whether the assets of Lear Fan Jet, by way of blueprints and plans, are vested in the United States corporation and can, therefore, be developed by another American company, to the detriment of the British taxpayer?

Dr. Boyson: That matter has concerned us all, and lawyers are looking into it. I cannot, therefore, give the hon. Gentleman a straight yes or no answer. It has been obvious for some time that the patent rights are ours and will be for a time. As soon as I can give the House a definitive answer on that, I shall be delighted to do so.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the hon. Gentleman happy about the role played by the nominees of the IDB on the boards of such companies? Surely, if these men are doing their work properly, they can raise the alarm sooner about companies going wrong.

Dr. Boyson: There were two nominee directors on the Lear Fan board, appointed by the Government through various Departments. Warnings were given. However, if we had pulled the skids from under Lear Fan and not put the money in, we could have been sued because there was a tight agreement for every penny. We could also have been sued for breaking our word, and that could have cost us a lot more. We were warned about that and we told the directors about it. Eventually the decision was made by the company to cease trading, and that saved us much more money than would have been the case had we come out and had to pay for nothing at the end.

Devolution

6. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what further consideration he has given to rolling devolution for Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The Northern Ireland Act 1982 continues to offer a flexible and practical framework for devolving powers to representatives of the Northern Ireland constitutional parties. The crucial requirement for any scheme for a devolved administration is that it should command widespread acceptance throughout the community.

Mr. Hunter: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. May I ask him to clarify matters still further, first by refuting the charge that, in relation to rolling devolution, he is merely paying lip-service to the ideals of his predecessor, and, secondly and more positively, by asserting that the concept and implementation of rolling devolution is central to his overall strategy for the Province?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, and we must not lose sight of the aims of the 1982 Act. If the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland could bring themselves to reason together on these constitutional matters, they would be doing Northern Ireland a great service, and I shall use what weight I have to move them in that direction.

Mr. Maclennan: Is there the slightest evidence that the constitutional parties share the Government's view as to the desirable objectives in this matter?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, there is the slightest evidence if one reads their published documents. We must now turn that slight evidence into something more positive and definite.

Cross-Border Co-operation

7. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on cross-border co-operation between the Province and the Irish Republic.

Mr. Hurd: The two Governments are on good terms and seek to co-operate closely on matters where their interests coincide. Cross-border co-operation on security is particularly valuable. There is certainly scope for improvement, and such improvement must be one of our main aims.

Mr. Parry: Will the Secretary of State accept that the recent re-routing of Protestant marches in Catholic areas will be a setback to British-Irish relations in Northern Ireland? Will he also accept that such action is the best recruiting sergeant for the Provisional IRA and Noraid in America? In future, will he consider banning such provocative marches, rather than backing down to the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is concerned with cross-border co-operation.

Mr. Stanbrook: If we can persuade the Government of the United States to deprive terrorists of immunity from extradition, why cannot we similarly persuade the Government of the Irish Republic?

Mr. Hurd: The courts of the Irish Republic have shown in the McGlinchy case and the Shannon case a greater awareness than in the past of the argument that my hon. Friend is advancing. We would like to move further in that direction.

Mr. McCusker: Does the Secretary of State recall the controversy that arose a few weeks ago when the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary alleged that explosives used in the bomb that killed four police personnel at Kileen originated in the Irish Republic? Has co-operation between the police forces of the two parts of Northern Ireland established whether that explosive originated in the Irish Republic? Did the large amount of explosives found in Newry a few days ago also originate from the Republic?

Mr. Hurd: The investigation into the Kileen bombing is continuing. The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on one of the main areas of cross-border co-operation, as I see it. The Provisional IRA has large quantities of home-made explosives available to it. Some of the material is converted into explosives in the North and much of it is converted in the South. This is an area where co-operation and concerted action essential.

Dr. Mawhinney: Does my right hon. Friend accept that cross-border security is causing a great deal of confusion? We are told that co-operation is valuable and close, but we are also told that the heads of the two police forces will not talk to each other and that Dublin politicians reject any suggestion that Northern Ireland terrorists are enjoying refuge in the Republic. Can my right hon. Friend help to throw some light on this confusion?

Mr. Hurd: I do not know whether there is a great deal of confusion. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have often said, the experience is a mixed one. Security co-operation between the two countries is valuable and it should be improved. One form of improvement would be for meetings to take place between the RUC and the Garda at the most senior level as a matter of course.

Newry

8. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much public money has been invested in Newry in each of the last four years.

Dr. Boyson: Public expenditure within the Northern Ireland block is not determined on a geographical basis, and it is not possible to identify separately all expenditure in Newry.

I will, with permission, Mr. Speaker, provide my hon. Friend with a tabular statement in the Official Report of certain expenditure over the last four years which has gone to Newry town and Newry and Mourne district.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his answer, as far as it goes. However, on the evidence that I saw, there are many new buildings, including arts centres, theatres, sports stadiums and swimming pools, in Newry. Does he agree that towns of a similar size in the north-east of England, such as Guisborough in my constituency, could well do with some resources directed towards them and away from Northern Ireland?

Dr. Boyson: If my hon. Friend is concerned about expenditure in his area, he should take up the matter with the relevant Ministers. There is a separate Northern Ireland block and that is the basis on which decisions are made. Newry is an area of high unemployment. The last check revealed an unemployment rate of 31·5 per cent.——

Mr. Holt: That is not as high as in my constituency.

Dr. Boyson: There are many other difficulties in Newry and we have given priority to law and order in Northern Ireland. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that that is the right policy. Expenditure has been directed also to promote industrial development and to replace bad housing.

Mr. Nicholson: Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to condemn the Provisional IRA and other terrorists for continuing their attacks on human life and property in the Newry area? The necessary investment in the Newry area cannot take place while the attacks continue.

Dr. Boyson: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. On 28 February nine people were killed in Newry as a result of a mortar attack. If we can extend law and order more effectively throughout the Province there will be a considerable saving of expenditure as well as of life.

IRA (American Assistance)

9. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, when he last met the United States ambassador, he discussed assistance from American citizens to the Irish Republican Army.

Mr. Hurd: I saw the ambassador on 28 June and our confidential discussion ranged widely.

I have no doubt about the United States Government's opposition to those who support terrorism. They have discouraged Americans from contributing funds to organisations supporting terrorist groups and have shown themselves ready to see action taken against those who break the law.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thank my right hon. Friend for confirming the views of this country that no funds should be given by Irish Americans to the IRA. Will he make it clear that the attitudes and activities of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) in effectively supping with the devil in attending many meetings with supporters of the IRA in America and seemingly enjoying the hospitality of Noraid do not help this country? Does my right hon. Friend agree that these activities bring the views of Parliament very much into ill-repute? Will he condemn that behaviour and confirm that the rest of the country will not tolerate it?

Mr. Hurd: I have no knowledge of or any responsibility for the activities of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). Anyone who goes to the United States and is in any way beholden to Noraid should be well aware of the connection with Sinn Fein and the IRA.

Health and Social Services Boards

10. Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Belfast, North by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) on 19 June, Official Report, column 146, if he will give the reasons for not placing the full accounts and auditors' reports for the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland in the Library.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 19 June, but if there is any particular matter about which he is concerned I shall have it followed up if he will let me have the appropriate details.

Mr. Walker: In view of the disquieting reports of the serious malpractices in the Royal Victoria hospital, especially in the laundering, quartering, transport, security and catering divisions, does the hon. Gentleman agree that by not taking action to publish the health and social services reports he will arouse suspicion that there is a cover-up in his Department?

Mr. Patten: There is no question of any concealment. We follow exactly the same practices as the rest of the United Kingdom. The auditors' report on each of the health boards is made available to the Comptroller and Auditor-General, and he reports to Parliament on the summary of accounts.

Mr. Archer: Does the Under-Secretary of State have any plans for dealing with the crisis which now obtains at the Royal Victoria hospital through staff cuts and especially in relation to medical reports—which cannot be traced because they are lying about on the floor—and security, which is so starved of resources that the staff are physically in danger.

Mr. Patten: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had had the courtesy when he visited the Royal group of hospitals the other day to agree to meet the chairman of the board as well as the NUPE shop stewards, he would have heard that the Royal Victoria hospital has a budget of £84 million a year, that it is one of the most expensive hospital sites in the country and that we are doing a good deal to try deal with the records. For example, the board has appointed summer relief staff. Unfortunately so far, the organisation and methods study into medical records, which could bring about a great improvement, has been blocked by the trade unions.

11. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he proposes to take following the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General for Northern Ireland on the health and social services board accounts, about financial procedures in the north and west Belfast districts of the eastern board.

Mr. Chris Patten: The north and west Belfast district is now reorganised into three units of management, new senior staff are in post and new systems are being introduced. The board is providing regular progress reports on these matters to the Department. I note in the Comptroller and Auditor-General's report for 1983-84 that he accepts that a determined effort has been and continues to be made to improve the position.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the information that those steps have been taken. Is he satisfied that such steps will deal with the misuse of overtime and other abuses at the hospital? Will this release more funds for patient care? May we assume that the clique of Republicans, who have been using the system in the royal to deny this money to the patients, will continue?

Mr. Patten: Those are the objectives of the management which is attempting to ensure that the Royal Victoria, like every other hospital in the United Kingdom, lives within its budget.

Mr. Archer: Is it in order for the Under-Secretary of State to mislead the House by suggesting that I discourteously refused to see the chairman of the eastern health board, when the contrary is true? I was anxious to see the chairman, but, understandably, he was not in a position to see me. I tried to see him.

Mr. Patten: If what the right hon. and learned Gentleman says is correct, I shall certainly withdraw what I said. I understood that the chairman of the board had turned up at the hospital to meet the right hon. Gentleman, but that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had failed to meet him.

Mr. Archer rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The same rules must apply to everyone.

Terrorism

12. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any new proposals to defeat terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: Terrorism can be eradicated only by steadily applying firm security policies operating under the law. This needs the support of the whole law-abiding community in Northern Ireland and the co-operation of the police forces of the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic. The measures taken need to be flexible and constantly adapted to stay one step ahead of the terrorists.

Mr. Dubs: Why will the Secretary of State not accept that what would undermine the IRA in Northern Ireland and its political supporters more than anything else is a successful conclusion to the talks between London and Dublin and for the Republic to have a significant say in the affairs of Northern Ireland? That is the possibility that causes so much apprehension in the minds of the IRA, so why will the Minister not accept it?

Mr. Hurd: It is wholly naive to suppose that those who are killing their fellow citizens will be turned into decent citizens just because some agreement is reached between London and Dublin. There is everything to be said for an agreement, but the hon. Gentleman does the case no service by exaggerating it.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 11 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best way to reduce unemployment is to lighten the burden of taxes and interest rates on employers and employed alike by sensible and firm control of public spending? Is she aware that the success of Government policies is evidenced by new factories and shops as well as a new road, a new railway and a new hospital to be built in Bolton?

The Prime Minister: I agree wholly with my hon. Friend and I am very pleased that our firm policies have borne such excellent fruit in his constituency.

Mr. Kinnock: Did the Prime Minister remind her colleagues at this morning's Cabinet meeting that, since she came to office, public spending has risen by a record 16·5 per cent., and did she tell them whether they should complain or boast about that record, as they do not seem to know?

The Prime Minister: At this morning's meeting the Cabinet confirmed the public expenditure totals published in the Red Book of £139 billion for 1986-87 and £144 billion for 1987-88. Our objective is to try to reduce public spending as a proportion of national income. Public spending as a proportion of national income hit a peak under the Labour Government.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister intend to achieve that by cutting investment, or by cutting current expenditure on, for instance, benefits? Does she intend to continue the course which, depite the pleas of the CBI, has brought cuts of 6 per cent. on repairs, 6 per cent. on roads and 54 per cent. on housing, while running a budget that has increased taxation as a proportion of gross national product from 36 to 42 per cent.? Which of those records is she proud of?

The Prime Minister: Public expenditure this year is £134 billion. As I have said, it will be £139 billion next year. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, within the totals certain programmes have priority. Health and pensions, in particular, have had priority. As the right hon. Gentleman well knows, we have protected capital expenditure. When the Labour Government had to reduce expenditure enourmously at the instance of the International Monetary Fund the then Chief Secretary, now Lord Barnett, said that "it was politically easier to cut capital than to cut current expenditure".

and that under the Labour Government.

"The misery was shared out although the cuts disproportionately affected capital rather than current expenditure, as was invariably the case."

The Labour Government cut capital expenditure. We have increased it.

Mr. Kinnock: The right hon. Lady is misleading the House, even on her own figures. If she will look at her own White Paper on public expenditure, she will discover that the overall capital programme in real terms is down from £20 billion to £19 billion over the past six years. Will the right hon. Lady now tell us the answer to the question whether the Conservative party should be boasting or complaining about the 16·5 per cent. rise in public spending? Should it be complaining or boasting about the 6 per cent. rise in the share of GNP on taxation? Is the right hon. Lady proud of spending, or is she proud of cutting? Is she an Iron Lady—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Kinnock.

Mr. Kinnock: Conservative Members are only delaying things. I was asking the Prime Minister whether she is proud of her record as a spender, or as a cutter. Is he an Iron Lady or is she a closet flexi-toy?

The Prime Minister: Compared with the Labour Government's record, all members of my Government and Back Benchers should be proclaiming this Government's record with great pride. In practice, the last Labour Government — [Interruption.] In practice — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to hear the answer.

The Prime Minister: In practice, the last Labour Government cut expenditure on hospitals by 35 per cent. Capital expenditure on hospitals is now up by 23 per cent. Labour cut expenditure on roads by 33 per cent. The Conservatives have now put it up by 25 per cent. Labour cut capital expenditure on water by 29 per cent. Last year we put it up. The Labour Government's record was appalling.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Do not the last two questions by the Leader of the Opposition indicate that, to his usual gift of loquacity, he has now added economic schizophrenia?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his astute observation.

Mr. Dalyell: When the Prime Minister talked of flexi-toys, which of her distinguished colleagues did she have in mind?

The Prime Minister: None of mine; some of those on a certain Bench below the Gangway who are prepared to attune their policies to every by-election, whatever constituency it may be.

Q2. Mr. Dover asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 11 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dover: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity today to pay tribute to those involved in the repair work to the M1 in Hertfordshire, and particularly the contractors? Will she respond positively to the calls by the TUC and CBI for more road repair work?

The Prime Minister: I gladly congratulate all those who have virtually completed the repair work on the M1 ahead of time. I congratulate those who did the work, and my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of Transport who arranged it so excellently.

May I point out that spending on major motorway repairs is up by more than 50 per cent. in real terms. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member who asked the question has a right to hear the reply.

The Prime Minister: The M1 is a splendid example of the fact that, since 1978-79, spending on major motorway repairs has increased by more than 50 per cent. in real terms.

Dr. Owen: Does the Prime Minister have any idea of the consequences for district health authorities of the Government's failure to meet the full bill for the desirable increase in nurses' pay? Does she accept that it will involve ward closures, cuts in services and the postponement of equipment purchase on a massive scale? Does she agree that if we will the end of increasing nurses' pay, we should provide the means for the NHS to meet the bill?

The Prime Minister: This Government have provided far more in real terms than did the Government of whom the right hon. Gentleman was such a proud member. The Labour Government cut the National Health Service budget in real terms in two years. The expenditure must be met either from the enlarged budget during this Administration, or through increased taxation. Which would the right hon. Gentleman choose? If it is met by increased taxation, we would be taking money out of people's pockets and losing the jobs which the expenditure of that money would have created.

Dr. Michael Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the decision by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to require foreign diplomats in this country to pay their parking fines should be welcomed? Does she also agree that it should be extended so that diplomats in Britain either obey the rest of our laws or are sent home?

The Prime Minister: I share my hon. Friend's views and congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on the very firm stand that he has taken.

Q3. Mr. Dubs asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 11 July

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dubs: Can the Prime Minister say whether, after six years of her Government, the British people have derived any benefit from North sea oil?

The Prime Minister: Yes, of course. First, they have derived a great deal of benefit in income, which has been pumped straight out into services such as the National Health Service and law and order. The money has gone straight into the annual budget and straight out again. The income has enabled us gradually to replace that asset with overseas assets, which will continue to bring in income long after North sea oil has gone. When we came to power, overseas assets were worth £12 billion; now they are worth £76 billion. They regularly produce income in interest and dividends and give us a high invisible surplus to add to our balance of payments.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: In view of the remarks of the Lord Chief Justice this week about the role of television and television news reports in perpetuating violence, does my right hon. Friend believe that there is now a case for a broadcasting council?

The Prime Minister: Of course, I am always prepared to consider that. I very much welcome what the Lord Chief Justice said and I hope that the BBC and the Independent Broadcasting Authority will take note of it. The amount of violence that is seen on television is bound to have an effect on those least able to adjudge it.

Q4. Mr. Leighton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 11 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Leighton: Can the Prime Minister explain why all the pundits and commentators now say that she is no longer an asset to the Conservative party?

The Prime Minister: In that case, I wonder why the hon. Gentleman attacks me so fiercely.

Mr. Adley: Is my right hon. Friend aware that she is much better off relying on the views of the thousands of paid-up members of the Conservative party in my constituency than on her reputation among what the hon. Gentleman calls the media pundits? Now that we can look back at the Brecon and Radnor by-election dispassionately, does she agree that the MORI poll—although that company is now discredited—undoubtedly had a considerable effect on the outcome? Notwithstanding the fact that media hype is part of the stock in trade of the Liberal party, should we not reconsider, as do other European countries, the role of opinion polls in public elections?

The Prime Minister: Doubtless hon. Members will wish to consider that policy. As my hon. Friend is aware, it has never been any part of my policy to put undue constraints on those matters unless there is considerable reason for doing so.

Dr. David Clark: Has the Prime Minister had time today to read the report of the bombing and sinking of the Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior in Auckland? I realise that Greenpeace has embarrassed many people, but it has harmed none. Will she cable Prime Minister Lange and tell him that if he wishes we shall offer them all the facilities of the British services to try to track down the people who perpetrated that crime?

The Prime Minister: I appreciate the anxiety that the hon. Gentleman expresses. It is a matter for the New Zealand police. We await the outcome of the inquiries. If they ask for help, of course we shall consider giving it.

Mr. Parry: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise out of Question Time?

Mr. Parry: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I was not called on question No. 3——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Member was not called on question No. 3, but he was called on question No. 7. I think that he asked the supplementary question that he intended for question No. 3. I cannot help him. He was out of order.

Mr. Parry: As I received no reply, I shall raise the matter on the Adjournment as soon as possible.

Mr. Faulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising directly out of Prime Minister's Questions. You are renowned for your generosity and kindliness. [Interruption.] I am not after a job. In view of that, I wonder whether you could arrange for the Prime Minister to be sent on a long sabbatical, because she is obviously tiring. She would then have a chance to rethink all her policies.

Mr. Speaker: Thankfully, we are all going on a long sabbatical soon.

Business of the House

3.32 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 15 JULY—Opposition Day (18th Allotted Day). (Second part). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate on the funding of pay awards in the National Health Service, on a motion in the names of the leaders of the Social Democratic and Liberal parties.

Remaining stages of the Oil and Pipelines Bill.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Trustee Savings Banks Bill.

TUESDAY 16 JULY—Motions on the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1982-83 (House of Commons Paper No. 504); the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) 1985-86 (House of Commons Paper No. 478); the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1983-84 (House of Commons Paper No. 448); and the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report 1985-86 (House of Commons Paper No. 449).

WEDNESDAY 17 JULY — Remaining stages of the Administration of Justice Bill [Lords].

Motion on the Rate Reduction (City of Edinburgh District) 1985-86 Report.

Motion on the Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) Order.

THURSDAY 18 JULY—Estimates Day (4th Allotted day). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate on Estimates relating to export promotion. The Question will be put on all outstanding Votes and Estimates.

Remaining stages of the Insolvency Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 19 JULY—Motions on the Betting, Gaming, Lotteries and Amusements (Northern Ireland) Order; The Nursing Homes and Nursing Agencies (Northern Ireland) Order; and the Gas (Northern Ireland) Order.

MONDAY 22 JULY — Consideration of Lords amendments to the Social Security Bill and the Interception of Communications Bill and any Lords amendments which may be received to the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol, Etc.) Bill.

Remaining stages of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Bill [Lords].

Motion on the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975.

It is expected that the Chairman of Ways and Means will name opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

The House will wish to know Mr. Speaker, that subject to progress of business it is hoped to propose that the House should rise for the Summer Adjournment on Friday 26 July until Monday 21 October.

Estimates to be considered Thursday 18 July:

Class IV, Vote 4 (Export Promotion, Trade Co-operation, Corporate and Consumer Affairs):

Section A (Export Promotion) and Section B (Trade Co-operation) so far as they relate to United Kingdom trade with China.

Mr. Kinnock: Yesterday, on a point of order, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) raised the fact that the Home Secretary had slipped through in a written answer an announcement on the Government's changes in the immigration rules. As a parliamentarian himself, does the Leader of the House agree that it would be much more appropriate to make a full statement to the House so that the Home Secretary could be questioned immediately on a matter of major constitutional and human concern to many thousands of people in Britain. Will the right hon. Gentleman make up for the omissions of the Home Secretary and arrange an early debate in Government time so that we can give full consideration to a matter which is shabby and unjust and a cause of great anxiety to thousands of families in Britain?

Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that we have an early statement from the Secretary of State for Education and Science on teachers' pay as we are at the end of school terms and the Secretary of State has not been effective in dealing with an increasingly grave matter?

May I press the right hon. Gentleman to provide time for a debate on the Government's attitude towards South Africa? Does he agree that the mounting domestic repression in that country, the change in the attitude of the United States Congress, the recent revelations about the behaviour of the South African arms industry in this country and the attacks on Botswana are matters that would benefit from consideration in the House?

Why has the debate on the Scottish rate rebates order been tacked on to the end of a long and busy day next Wednesday? Have the Government a guilty conscience about the missing £20 million—the amount by which the promised £50 million has been reduced since the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Prime Minister made that promise at the Conservative party conference? Should not the House be accorded a much better time of day in which to consider this major matter of general importance which is of special importance to the people of Scotland?

Mr. Biffen: Perhaps I might take the right hon. Gentleman's points in the sequence in which they were presented. I dissociate myself totally from his strictures against my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary concerning an announcement about a change in the immigration rules, but I agree that there is a good case for a debate on this matter. Perhaps we could pursue it through the usual channels.

I shall of course make known to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety about a statement on teachers' pay. The right hon. Gentleman will realise that at this very moment discussions are taking place, the conclusion of which will probably condition how we should proceed.

I note the right hon. Gentleman's interest in a debate on South Africa. Again, I in no sense underwrite the language he used, but it is a valid request which we could consider through the usual channels.

I know that we are in that rather delicate stage of the session when political motives are invested with all kinds of lurid characteristics, but I do not think that there is any reason for taking the motion on the Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) Order at the proposed time on Wednesday evening other than the crowded condition of the order of business which I have announced this week, which is related to what I believe is a universally welcome aspiration—to rise by Friday 26 July.

Sir Frederic Bennett (Torbay): The Leader of the House will have noted that on the Order Paper there is a number of motions expressing different points of view about the strategic defence initiative, but all of them have in common a request for a debate as soon as possible on the subject. Does he agree that, as the other place has had no fewer than four debates this year on the matter, that every Western European Parliament except ours has had a similar debate and that the Western European Assembly has also had a debate, he should consider providing an early opportunity for a debate when the House reassembles so that we are no longer the only Western European Parliament not to have discussed this important subject?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the importance that my hon. Friend attaches to this subject, but I would point out to him that it was available for discussion during our recent two-day debate on the Defence Estimates. Nevertheless, I shall bear his remarks in mind.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): May I reinforce the plea of the Leader of the Opposition for a clear statement by the Home Secretary on the change in the immigration laws? Because of a reply to a written question the situation is obscure. This matter should not be lost sight of during the normal feverish activities of July.

Mr. Biffen: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. That is why, through the usual channels, we are considering providing an opportunity for a debate.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): May I remind my right hon. Friend that not only is the Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg a matter of hot dispute but that it is to be the subject of another decision in January 1986? May I also remind him that the matter has never been debated or voted upon in this House? Is he able to give an undertaking that the Government will ensure that a debate takes place before a substanive decision is made?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot give an undertaking that such a debate will take place in Government time, but I note my hon. Friend's interest in this topic. It is not the first time that he has mentioned it. I very much hope that he will be successful in pursuing the matter.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Because the Nursing Homes and Nursing Agencies (Northern Ireland) Order has not yet been laid and was unheard of until 24 hours ago, does the Leader of the House feel that we can be expected next Friday to debate this order upon which there has been no opportunity whatsoever for consultation?

Mr. Biffen: I am advised that the Nursing Homes and Nursing Agencies (Northern Ireland) Order which was laid today has been made under the urgent procedure, following representations by interested persons in Northern Ireland. Because the order was made under this procedure, no proposal was drafted and circulated. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is today writing to the Speaker of the Northern Ireland Assembly to explain why the urgent procedure was used. [Interruption.] There is no need for the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) to point as though he were on the other side of the Western oceans. I understand the susceptibilities that have been raised in this House, and I shall discuss the matter with the right hon. Gentleman through the usual channels.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): As the Water (Fluoridation) Bill has passed through all its stages in another place and will presumably return here fairly soon, will my right hon. Friend ensure that its passage will not be unduly delayed? Whatever may be one's views on this Bill—and I am neutral—it is important to the water industry and a decision should not be unreasonably delayed.

Mr. Biffen: I note my hon. Friend's question. His observation is relevant, not least in the context of the time that is still available for debate.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Has the special branch reported to the Prime Minister that in Liverpool, Bootle and elsewhere unemployed people are being recruited to fight as mercenaries in Nicaragua? Has the special branch also reported that those who are recruiting these people were also involved in recruiting mercenaries to fight in Angola? What kind of surveillance——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must ask for a debate on this matter.

Mr. Roberts: I am asking for a debate on it, Mr. Speaker. I should like to be told in a statement next week what surveillance the special branch has kept over those people who are still in this country who were involved in recruiting mercenaries for Angola. This is not a laughing matter. Many of the young unemployed people in my constituency have been approached. If they are on heroin, they are easy prey to this kind of recruitment. A statement is necessary.

Mr. Biffen: I shall refer to my relevant right hon. Friend that request for a statement. As to a debate, I think that the hon. Gentleman will be disposed to take the opportunities offered by the recess Adjournment debate.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): As I assume that Her Majesty's Government continue to feel constrained by the wise provisions of the United Nations charter, which prohibit us from looking at the domestic affairs of sovereign states, and as I assume that our interests in countries abroad is mainly confined to the influence of events there on our investment and trading interests, and if, as seems likely, my right hon. Friend concedes a debate on South Africa, may I ask that it include civil order in sub-Saharan Africa as a whole?

Mr. Biffen: I shall take that request into account when any arrangements are concluded for such a debate.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): In view of the trenchant all-party criticism by the Public Accounts Committee report published today on the future of the royal dockyards in Rosyth and Devonport and the financial basis of the Government's options, and the Committee's statement about the inadequacy of the information provided to Parliament on those options, will the Leader of the House undertake that the Secretary of State for Defence will make a statement to the House setting out the financial thinking before he takes any decision on the matter, certainly before the recess?

Mr. Biffen: All reports from the Public Accounts Committee are subject to a proper and measured response from Government Departments. I am sure that that will be the case in this instance.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): If it is possible to have an early statement on the teachers' pay dispute, may it be broad enough to take account of meetings such as the one that took place in outer London last week? It was addressed by the Labour party's spokesman on education, somebody from the National Union of Teachers, members of Militant Tendency, and sacked miners. It was a small meeting, at which a spokesman said that he was delighted that strikes were taking place at 14 schools in the area, including two special schools. Should not we look hard at the damage that is being done to children's education by the Labour party and such statements?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I understand that he is requesting a statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. I shall draw my right hon. Friend's attention to his observations.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that a very important meeting of the Council of steel Ministers in Europe is scheduled for 26 July and that the Government expect to receive the British Steel Corporation's corporate plan at the end of July? Does he agree that it would be most unfortunate if we were to go into the recess with any doubt hanging over the future of Llanwern, Port Talbot and Ravenscraig? Will he make sure that a Minister makes a statement before the House goes into recess guaranteeing the future of those great works?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly represent that point of view to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): Does my right hon. Friend accept that in the west country there is considerable doubt and confusion resulting from the decision of the Select Committee of both Houses on the Okehampton bypass, which continues to frustrate the decision made by the inspector in a full and fair public inquiry? Will he press upon my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport the urgent need to make a statement so that the doubt and confusion are brought to an end immediately?

Mr. Biffen: I happily comply with that request.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): In view of the widespread concern that has been expressed about the conduct of Treasury Ministers and civil servants in the Johnson Matthey Bankers collapse, will the Leader of the House guarantee that there will be a debate before we rise for the summer recess?

Mr. Biffen: I am in no position to make such a guarantee in respect of Government time. Other opportunities are available to the hon. Gentleman. Knowing him as I do, I expect him to take advantage of them.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Further to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page), and as the Water (Fluoridation) Bill has been extensively debated, in every aspect and at interminable length, may we have an undertaking from my right hon. Friend that when it returns to the House from the other place it will be guillotined, in the interests of the majority?

Mr. Biffen: At this stage all that I can say is that I note with great interest the silent majority now becoming rather more vocal.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Can the Leader of the House rearrange the timetable for next week so that we may have a debate on the Select Committee of Employment report about the National Coal Board's dismissal of employees? This matter is very pressing. At least 80 per cent. of those people sacked by the board are not in the category that the Prime Minister and other Ministers shout about from the Dispatch Box—that they are in a position to be found guilty of violent crimes. Some of them have never been in front of a court. This House ought to debate the report on the dismissals as soon as possible, and certainly before the recess, because the situation has given rise to a lot of hardship and low morale in the coal industry.

Mr. Biffen: I cannot undertake to rearrange next week's business to accommodate a debate upon the Select Committee report. That is not because of any unease about the Committee's report; it is primarily because the programme we have already announced is drawn tightly with a view to the House rising on 26 July. There is simply not room for endless additional debates.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Several weeks have elapsed since my right hon. Friend reacted sympathetically to my request for a debate on the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs about the plight of Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. Will he give the House an opportunity to discuss this matter? May I also draw his attention to the increasing interest in the country about the establishment of family courts? Will he give the House an opportunity to consider that important issue?

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry to disappoint my hon. Friend, but there is no prospect of Government time being made available for those two topics in the near future. As he knows, we will have the recess Adjournment motion and the subsequent Adjournment debates, and those could well give rise to consideration of those topics.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): May I press the Leader of the House further on two aspects of the change in the immigration rules? Does he agree that it is important to have a debate before the House rises for the summer recess? Secondly, could he give an undertaking that such a debate would be separate from the problem of the Tamils on which there is a prayer in the names of my right hon. Friends? It is a totally separate issue.

Mr. Biffen: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. I hope that I will be able to satisfy him on it.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the fact that the wages council regulations which the Government are proposing to repeal contain about the only statutory minimum rights to holidays which exist in our law? Are we to have a debate on those regulations before the House rises, and will we have a debate on the deplorable lack of holiday rights of people in this country?

Mr. Biffen: I regret that there is no prospect of Government time being made available for a debate on those topics.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Has the right hon. Gentleman seen early-day motion 791—

[That this House applauds the local councils of Liverpool, Lambeth and Edinburgh, and other local authorities, who are prepared to struggle to defend jobs and services on behalf of ordinary decent people; recognises that Government legislation and policy leaves these local authorities with no alternative but to conduct a campaign to defend working people, existing in hopeless conditions; and, in acknowledging the enormous advances being made in places like Liverpool, in house building and urban renewal, thus creating employment in the public and private sector, calls on the Government to draw back from its attacks on these local authorities.]—

[That this House condemns the Government's policies towards local authorities, with their centralised controls and financial penalties, and therefore fully supports those councillors like the Labour councillors in the Liverpool City Council who have made a rate, based on the needs of the people of Liverpool, but who, in the process, are forced to make a stand against Government policy; points out clearly that, if the Government's policies were supported in Liverpool, it would mean cuts in local services and create increased unemployment amongst council workers, in an area which already has extremely high levels of unemployment; and calls on the Government to restore the rate support grant that has been taken away from the Liverpool City Council, to increase the housing investment programme which has been cut, and to urge the district auditor to drop his present action against councillors.]

Motion 791 is in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) and motion 847 was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer).

In view of speculation in the media that the House may be recalled because of the situation in Liverpool and that emergency legislation has been prepared, will the Leader of the House allow an emergency debate as soon as possible, and will he state whether legislation has been prepared and whether the commissioner is ready to go to Liverpool?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has touched on an important point, but it would not help if I were to speculate on the use of legislation. I fear that there is such a shortage of Government time for debate over the next couple of weeks that, if the topic is to be raised, it will have to be raised by the hon. Member using such opportunities as he possesses.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House try to accommodate a number of the Members who have raised matters of importance so that they may be dealt with before the recess? One fairly easy way out would be to reduce the three months' holiday that Members of Parliament have just been allocated. That is not the most popular suggestion around, but if we were to reduce it we could have a debate on the Tamils, a debate on the National Health Service, a debate on an amnesty of miners who have been sacked, and a day or two-day debate on that squalid business about Johnson Matthey and all the fraudulent activities within it. We could have a right old time, even if we had only another week.

Mr. Biffen: I am slightly concerned at the prospect of a Bolsover benefit week when all these topics would be poured on us, particularly as we now learn that the hon. Gentleman views the three months in prospect as holiday time. There are very few hon. Members who pack up and go on holiday for three months at the end of July. The hon. Gentleman may make an annual pilgrimage to Skegness, but for most of us it is back to our constituencies, and we see very little of the rest of the world.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Could some room be found for the Foreign Secretary to make a statement on his return from South America? If such a statement were possible, could the right hon. and learned Gentleman deal with the question of serious over-fishing in the South Atlantic by virtually every country in the world except the British and the Argentines? For example, the Taiwanese, Bulgarians, Koreans and Russians—virtually everybody except ourselves—are running riot in relation to fishing stocks. Will he also react to the statement in the second item of today's BBC news, of which admittedly we do not have the full text, to the effect that predictably and predicted, foreseeably and foreseen, the Argentines have said "No" to the initiative that has been taken in relation to imports in the absence of any discussion on sovereignty?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of the points raised by the hon. Gentleman, and I shall certainly refer them to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In view of the impropriety, immorality and, indeed, illegality of the prime purpose rule, and in the light of the Prime Minister's unconcerned and superficial response to me on a question to do with this matter the other day, may I back the Leader of the Opposition's insistence that the House have an opportunity to debate this whole matter before we go into the recess?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly look into that matter.

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the Home Secretary to make a statement next week so that he can inform the House when he intends to introduce legislation to deprive drug traffickers of their ill-gotten profits?

Mr. Biffen: I shall refer that point to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to read the comments of Mr. Robert Caton, the chairman of the Association of Charity Officers, that the Government's new regulations for payments for the elderly and disabled in residential accommodation are leading to a shortfall of £20 a week in rest homes and £70 in nursing homes? Has he also read the comments of Christian Wolmar and Jonathan Foster in The Observer last week that the Prime Minister's recent answer to the Leader of the Opposition showed that she did not fully understand the regulations? Will the right hon. Gentleman ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to withdraw these terrible and damaging regulations until Ernst and Whinney, the management consultants, have had an opportunity to look at the levels of payments?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman returns to a subject that on several recent occasions has featured in his requests. I shall of course refer his points to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Last week the right hon. Gentleman intimated that before the House rises for the summer recess there would be a debate on the position of Tamil asylum seekers and refugees as well as the visa restrictions. As far as I understand, he has failed to give a categorical assurance of a debate on the immigration rules announced in yesterday's statement by the Home Secretary. Will he now give a categorical assurance that before the House rises there will be a debate which will include the question of the Tamil asylum seekers, the unprecedented visa restrictions on anyone wishing to leave Sri Lanka and the implementation of yesterday's announcement by the Home Secretary in relation to a European Court decision?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, which is a repeat of what he said last week. I can best help him by referring to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft).

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why should the Leader of the house suggest that the debate on Johnson Matthey take place in Opposition time when the Government are £200 million on risk? Surely the debate should take place in Government time. Is it not fair to say that over the past three months the Government have deliberately set out to engineer a failure to debate this matter because they have so much to hide?

Mr. Biffen: I find the innuendo not appropriate to these exchanges. I think that Hansard will reveal that I said that there would be no opportunity for debate in Government time until the end of July.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that information has come to me that an action of interdict is to be commenced in the Court of Session in Edinburth tomorrow against the sale of the trustee savings bank? In the circumstances, what plan has he for the debate he has announced for Monday evening?

Mr. Biffen: I received a letter to that effect just before I came into the Chamber. I will look at the matter as a matter of urgency and get in touch with the right hon. Gentleman.

ESTIMATES DAY

[3RD ALLOTTED DAY]—considered

Estimates 1985-86

Department of the Environment

Class VII, Vote 1

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum not exceeding £1,151,288,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of the Environment on subsidies, the option mortgage scheme, improvements and investment, grants to housing associations and the Housing Corporation and sundry other housing services.—[Sir George Young.]

Mr. Speaker: I understand it will be convenient for the House to discuss also the following Estimates: class VII, vote 2, class VIII, vote 2; class VIII, vote 3; class VIII, vote 5; class XIV, vote 1

4.3 pm

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): Last year and again this year the Select Committee on the Environment has produced two reports, one commenting on the main Estimates of the Department of the Environment and the other on the main Estimates of the Property Services Agency. I wish to draw the attention of the House to those reports, published on 22 May, which are noted on today's Order Paper. In preparing them the Committee has scrutinised closely the whole range of Estimates concerned and taken evidence from officials. The work is laborious but necessary and we have been charged to do it by the House because of the way in which, in the past, vast amounts of public money have been voted annually without debate.

The results of our scrutiny may not attract widespread public interest and are the reverse of sensational. Nevertheless, they are of value in Parliament's work of scrutiny of expenditure by the Executive.

I shall start with the Department of the Environment. We looked first at some matters on which we commented in our two reports of last year. The Government have not yet remedied the situation that dog licences cost substantially more to issue than the revenue that they raise. The net cost is still in the order of £3·4 million a year. There has been a consultation paper following our last year's report but no action has so far been taken. We consider that the House should not be asked to vote further Supply for this wasteful purpose next year, although we are giving the Government a little more time this year and do not seek a reduction of the vote. The Government must make up their mind to abolish the licence or to introduce a new cost-effective system for the care and control of dogs along the lines of the working party paper produced in 1976.

The Committee returned again to our criticism that some expenditure is being incurred on a regular basis by the Department under the sole authority of the Appropriation Acts. This situation has not been remedied. For example, £850,000 is being paid to various international bodies without any specific statutory authority, and this seems to be a common practice in most Departments. The Committee regards this as unsatisfactory, and if corrective action is not taken before next year's Estimates the House should consider very seriously whether or not it is prepared to vote money in this way.

Last year we also drew attention to the considerable over-claiming of housing subsidy by local authorities. We are pleased to learn that the Department has made changes in this sector which should have the effect of reducing over-claiming of the kind of levels unavoidable in any system of paying in advance. We feel that to abate claims where audited returns are not submitted in a reasonable time is a correct way forward.

We were not happy as a Committee about the state of housing maintenance. It seems certain that there is a very large backlog both in the private and in the public sectors. The level of local authority expenditure in improvement grants is falling. It is true that the Government have issued a consultative paper upon which comments were due last Tuesday, but the time has been further extended. It is not clear what the position is in the public sector from any of the evidence we have been able to adduce. In fact, there is a lack of information about the precise dimensions of the whole problem.

It is true that there is to be a house condition survey in 1986. I hope the Minister will be able to assure us that the information collected will be in a form that can be compared with the results of the last survey. If we have to accept that resources available for renovation are limited, it is all the more important to have a clear picture of the problem and to deploy the resources available to the best possible advantage.

We commented in our report upon the provision of sites for gipsy caravans. Such sites are provided for 65 per cent. of caravans, so there is a substantial shortage. Most of us are familiar with the kind of problems that this gives rise to. We also felt concerned that some local authorities were using the grant, which has a heavy Exchequer reimbursement element in it, not for true travellers but as a cheap means of rehousing families who would otherwise have to come off their general housing waiting list. I hope that the Minister will look into this much neglected area of his Department's activities.

Also of importance is the inadequate provision made by the Department and local authorities for those who are prepared to move their homes in search of work. At present local authorities make available only 1 per cent. of their new lettings for people coming into their areas from other parts of the country. That does not encourage mobility of labour. We have therefore made a modest proposal that the figure should be raised to 2 per cent. I realise the difficulties for local authorities in giving increased priority to one group as against another in allocating their housing resources, but 1 per cent. is a very pathetic figure at a time of high unemployment. Perhaps the Government could provide some financial inducement to authorities which are prepared to do more and penalise those which are not.

We have some comments to make upon the development corporations in Liverpool and London. In Liverpool, no evaluation seems to have been made of the imaginative experiments of the Liverpool international garden festival, and this should have been done. We need to know whether money spent in this way is the best way to help to regenerate areas of urban blight.

In London, we were disturbed by the evidence that the administrative costs of the London Docklands development corporation appear to be 20 per cent. of its total costs, while the comparable figure for the Merseyside development corporation was only 8 per cent. There may be good reasons for this disparity, and if so they should be spelt out. We hope that the Minister will be able to give us further enlightenment or promises to carry out an investigation into this discrepancy.

I shall now deal with the Property Services Agency. There is another backlog of maintenance in the public estates administered by the PSA, and that is expected to grow in the coming year. The danger is that neglected work will give rise to greater expenditure in the future than if it were tackled immediately. No doubt the Minister will plead a lack of resources, but in that case it is necessary to ensure that the available money is being spent in the most effective way.

In accordance with the current practice in the Civil Service of giving local managers more responsibility for expenditure on the resources that they are using, the PSA has been delegating maintenance work to individual Departments. At present, Departments can spend up to £1,000 on a job without reference to the PSA. This figure is too small, and it is indicative, we felt on hearing the evidence, of the reluctance on the part of the PSA to relax its monopoly on the facile excuse that Government Departments are incapable of supervising contract work in excess of the derisory figure of £1,000 a job. We are convinced that much more value for money is to be obtained by increasing local managers' responsibility in the various Government Departments.

The main observations in our report are concerned with the relationships between the PSA and the Departments. Under the two-year-old property repayment services system, Departments are now charged a rental by the PSA for the accommodation they occupy, whether the property is in the Government's direct ownership or belongs to a private landlord to whom the PSA pays rent. An oddity is that the rentals collected by the PSA are paid straight into the Consolidated Fund and are not credited to the agency in the Estimates. If they were, a more realistic profit and loss account would be produced and surplus rents could be put into reserve to finance further acquisitions when appropriate.

I appreciate that the purpose of the property repayment service system is essentially to encourage Departments to appreciate the value of the accommodation that they happen to occupy and therefore make any appropriate economies which that knowledge can bring about. However, there are shortcomings in the way that the system operates in practice, if only in the great amount of paperwork that it seems to generate. The Committee came to the conclusion that it would like to see a civil accommodation account for the PSA, set out on commercial lines with past capital expenditure, current expenditure and revenue all taken properly into account. This would enable a far more accurate assessment of the Government's property portfolio.

The Government have continued their policy of transferring design work from the PSA to outside consultants. As far as the Committee could tell, the change is resulting in increased costs. We are told that this is a short-term phenomenon and that the introduction of fee competition between consultants that took place in 1984 will reduce the costs entirely. Clearly, this part of expenditure calls for continuing close scrutiny. I hope that the Minister will assure us that he is not allowing consultancy firms to take him for a ride.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): My hon. Friend has given us an excellent resumé of the Committee's views and I do not wish to add much. However, does he agree that too narrow a range of consultants is being asked to make tenders, and that only large organisations are being asked? Are there not many people operating on a much smaller base who could do the work just as well, and probably a great deal more cheaply than the big boys are doing it at the moment?

Sir Hugh Rossi: My hon. Friend is a member of the Committee and has taken a close interest in this aspect. There is a great deal of merit in his proposition. I anticipate that my hon. Friend the Minister may take the view that it is necessary to maintain the balance between firms of proven worth and whose which are unknown but nevertheless may offer services at a reduced fee. The Department could well examine that more carefully with a view to widening the range of people with whom the PSA is prepared to do business.

The Committee had several comments about our examination of the PSA's expenditure on major new works. I am glad that, despite the criticisms that we have made in other parts, we were able to congratulate the agency on the much better presentation of this year's material than last year's. However, we still have reservations as to the way in which the Treasury makes money available for purchasing properties when they come onto the market on advantageous terms.

From the evidence that we received from officials, it seems that, practically, this can be done in current circumstances only if the PSA has an unexpected shortfall on expenditure on other works. This is a hit and miss way to buy property that comes on the market on good terms, and not an intelligent way to operate a property portfolio. To this extent, my previous remarks about a civil accommodation account on a proper commercial basis, giving credit for all rents payable by Departments, would be a way in which a fund could be built up, as happens in the private sector, in order to buy a property at the right time.

We feel that Departments should be strongly discouraged, when giving new contracts, from altering their specification for new projects after the time when financial provision for them has been made in the Estimates. Failure to discourage them makes the original Estimates presented to the House meaningless, and that is one of the criticisms that the Committee had to make strongly.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The hon. Gentleman is advancing his case eloquently. I underline what he just said by reiterating our experience when we debated the Estimates last year. We were much concerned about possible corruption in the PSA, but are now concerned with incompetence. If accounts are badly presented and if people have written into those accounts estimates that fall well short of the final figure, is it any wonder that people misrepresent that as corruption?

Sir Hugh Rossi: The PSA itself talked about corruption, which caused it concern and which was the subject of investigation by another Committee of the House. Steps are being taken to deal with any corruption, but much still remains to be done about the presentation of the Estimates. Perhaps the PSA is a prisoner of Treasury conventions, some of which we criticise in our report.

The Select Committee is glad to have had the opportunity of examining the Estimates. It has been of value to us to range across all the Department's activities. We hope that the results of our work will also be of some value to the House and, of course, to the Department.

4.21 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I am pleased to follow the excellent presentation by the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), the Chairman of the Select Committee. All members of the Select Committee, from whichever party, would commend to the House his diligence in chairing the Select Committee and his taskmaster approach.

I shall deal with four matters, starting with the Property Services Agency. There is undoubtedly a need for continuing close scrutiny of the PSA. I trust that the Minister will be able to give us the assurance that he was unable to give last year—that the many shortcomings in the PSA have been put right.

PSA officials appeared before the Select Committee and it was clear to all of us that its accounting methods were unsatisfactory. We discovered many examples, if not of bad housekeeping, of bad presentation. That is why the memory of Sir Geoffrey Wardale's report, which dealt with corruption in the PSA, still hangs over that organisation. He concluded that the organisation of the PSA had not been put right and that many defects and examples of inefficiency and incompetence still existed. He also said that he could not be sure that corruption had been ended. That is clearly a matter for the Department of the Environment.

The contrast between the retaliatory measures which the Government take against local authorities and against the PSA is considerable. Within their own house, the Government are often not as scrupulous about obtaining value for money and dealing with inefficiency and incompetence as they are when challenging local authorities, which, on the whole, have given far better value for money than the PSA.

I commend to the House the recommendation on the civil accommodation account. This method of presenting accounts would ensure that some of the criticisms of the PSA that we have made over the past two years would not need to be made again.

The Chairman of the Select Committee talked about gipsy sites. Many local authorities have failed to implement the terms of the Caravan Sites Act 1968. The reason for that is that the legislation is not mandatory, and many local authorities do not implement it. Those local authorities which have chosen to implement it have attracted travellers and gipsies to their areas. This allows other local authorities to pretend that they have no problem and that there is no need for them to make provision.

Many authorities which have provided sites also have many other pressing social issues to deal with. On Merseyside, the Liverpool city council with all-party agreement, provided a site at considerable public expense, while other adjacent authorities, such as the Wirral and Sefton, made no such provision. Liverpool's problems in connection with travelling people have increased as a result of its attempts to tackle the problem, whereas other authorities which have done nothing do not attract the problems.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): The experience on Merseyside appears to be different from that in my area. Those authorities which have achieved designation are able to control the problem, but those which have not yet provided sites end up with a flood of gipsies who have been moved on from designated areas. Perhaps the situation is different in different parts of the country.

Mr. Alton: I was about to make that point. No clear lines can be drawn and the problem does vary in different parts of the country. Merseyside and other areas with ports of entry, especially from the Republic of Ireland, have particular problems.

It is clear that the legislation is not being uniformly implemented throughout the country and that some local authorities are getting away with making no provision, while others have to bear the brunt. That is clearly unsatisfactory.

I agree that more needs to be done to evaluate the work of development corporations. I admit that I was sceptical about establishing development corporations. I was nervous that the Merseyside development corporation would simply try to take the place of the local authority and that it would lead to the further erosion of local democracy. I am glad to be able to say that the work done by the development corporation on Merseyside, especially in connection with the international garden festival, has been spectacularly successful. I pay special tribute to all those involved, including Basil Bean, the chief executive of the development corporation, who is soon to move to another post. He has been a driving force, like Sir Leslie Young, who, as chairman, was the corporation's local anchor. He understood local commerce and problems and tried to take into account local political sensitivities.

If the development corporation is to continue to be successful, we must broaden the board to ensure that all local political opinion is taken into account. I am pleased that Mr. John Smith has accepted the deputy chairmanship of the corporation, but I emphasise that some people on Merseyside are worried because the political weight of the corporation does not take into account the views of people outside the Conservative party. That could bring discredit upon the corporation.

Apart from improving democratic accountability and ensuring that political opinions are properly represented, I agree with the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green about the need to evaluate the work of the development corporations. I should like to know how many jobs have been created on Merseyside as a result of the garden festival. Much was said in advance about it providing a stimulus to employment. In that sense, the garden festival has not been as successful as it was in terms of being a major land reclamation project. About £30 million of public money has been spent. We should be given some idea of the cost effectiveness of such projects and of how useful they are in stimulating local commercial recovery.

I hope that the development corporation will be encouraged to continue its work in redeveloping the south dock area of Liverpool and to establish the northern Tate gallery at Albert dock. I hope that adequate funds will be made available to enable the corporation to complete some of its imaginative projects.

Dealing finally with direct labour organisations, many do not provide value for money. That was made clear to us by witnesses from the Department, the PSA and local government. In the two years that I have served on the Select Committee, I have become ever more convinced —even more than when I served as chairman of the housing committee in Liverpool — that we must find other ways of managing large areas of municipal housing.

I was brought up in a flat on a council estate and I am well aware of the way in which council property can meet the needs of those who come from the poorest backgrounds and cannot afford to buy their own homes. There will always be a role for public sector housing, but the way in which that housing is managed and maintained should be further considered by Parliament and by the Select Committee of which I have the privilege to be a member.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should reflect carefully on what he just said. He implied that council housing was appropriate only for the poorest section of the community who cannot afford to buy their own homes. Surely a major principle of council housing is that it is based on need and not on income. Rather than going for the ghettoisation effect of public housing as in the United States, which the hon. Gentleman implies, we should be going for a broader spread of social background for council housing.

Mr. Alton: I was implying that there should be as much diversity in housing as we can achieve. If people do not have a need, I would prefer that they were not reliant on public sector housing. I want to see the dismantling of municipal empires, with control being handed over to tenants living on estates, particularly through housing co-operatives. I want to see more opportunity for self-build and for low-cost homes for sale. As many people as possible should be able to enjoy the comfort of decent housing.

Some of the worst housing conditions in my city are, I am afraid to say, in municipal housing, and that situation has pertained under all administrations. That has happened because those who live in that housing often do not feel that they have a stake in the community. In other words, they do not feel that their homes belong to them.

That is why we must hand over as much property as possible, to the tenants on council estates through a radical system of decentralisation, especially supporting housing co-operatives. Indeed, the best clerks of works, as it were, who are able to get value for money, are the people who live on those council estates.

The Government's present policy of simply selling off council houses is not the answer. Equally, the action of Labour authorities in cities such as mine in preventing people from forming housing co-operatives is diametrically opposed to the best interests of the people. I want diversity, coupled with value for money. That is why I say that the best clerks of works are those who live on council estates. If they are given control of their homes, they will get value for money when they hire labour for maintenance purposes.

I am depressed by the present state of much council accommodation, not only in my city, but throughout the country. People are often obliged to live in damp, squalid conditions, and that can have an enormous effect on family life. People can be driven to the depths of despair because of the conditions in which they are forced to live. The Government should provide more resources to tackle these problems. They should also encourage the establishment of housing co-operatives and the dismantling of large corporations.

It is clear that, in this sphere, bigger is not better. Of the 70,000 council properties in my city, 6,000 are currently lying empty. I have in the past highlighted examples of houses—fortunately they have now been demolished—which had stood empty for 23 years. I believe that the local authority had even forgotten that it actually owned those properties. That is what can happen when council ownership grows like Topsy and direct labour organisations and municipalities decide what is best for the people living in their houses. We need a more radical approach.

Too much emphasis has been laid in the past simply on the problems of the public sector, as the Select Committee points out. In many parts of inner cities the challenge will come in housing action and general improvement areas, where progress has come largely as the result of progressive legislation enacted by the last Labour Government and as the result of grants provided by the present Government.

The Minister frequently tells us about the amount of money that has been made available for improvement grants, but because of the reduction now being made in improvement grants, the work done in the 1970s and early 1980s is being put at risk in housing action areas. We shall end up with a patchwork quilt of housing renovation and decay. In other words, by being pennywise and poundfoolish we are wasting a great deal of public money that has already been invested in those areas.

About 400,000 building workers are today languishing on the dole. Public money is being paid to them to remain idle. The cost of leaving people unemployed, of paying benefit and of lost income tax which they would otherwise be paying, coupled with the cost of private and public sector housing, is enormous. I cannot understand the logic of such economics and I hope that the Government will reconsider their approach both to public and private sector housing. They must stop using housing as an economic barometer for their monetary idealogies.

I again pay tribute to the Chairman of, and my colleagues on, the Select Committee. It is vital work to examine public accounts. It is important for Select Committees to act as the watchdogs and guardians of the public purse. We have discharged that responsibility in the way that the House would expect.

Hon. Members must one day give serious consideration to improving the powers of Select Committees so that they can do more, perhaps by way of directly stimulating change and initiating legislation. I hope that at some future time it will not simply be a question of the Chairman of our Select Committee putting points to the Minister, but that he will have a chance to initiate the changes which both he and we know are necessary.

Mr. Norman Miscampbell (Blackpool, North): The point that I wish to make, while specific, might be felt to be narrow. However, for those who are affected, it is a point of great importance.

We referred last year to the cost of dog licences, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) commented on the subject in his remarks today. I congratulate him on the quality of his speech. He said that nothing had been done about the matter, and it is true that, while we have had a consultation paper, nothing appears to be happening in relation to dog licences.

Nor is it simply a question of revenue, although it seems ludicrous to raise only a fraction of the cost of providing the licences. However, I should have thought that, if for no other purpose than that of revenue, the course that I shall urge would commend itself to the Government.

There is more to it than finance. In recent weeks in Blackpool there have been two cases of toxocariasis, a disease which causes blindness. It arises through dog dirt. Almost inevitably, and tragically, children come in contact with it in the parks and elsewhere, although it can affect anybody. Of the two cases in Blackpool, one resulted in total blindness, and in the other a child lost an eye. When a parent sends his or her children to play in the park and finds that that is the result of what is considered to be an innocent occupation, the trauma is difficult to overestimate.

It is essential that a proper licence fee is charged that induces some responsibility. That would help in large measure. Secondly, the Government should bear in mind that the burden of policing parks rests firmly upon the shoulders of local authorities. A substantial proportion of the new sum that is raised should be given specifically to the authorities which have the responsibility, the difficulty and the expense. The sum should be additional to any other moneys that they receive. It should be given to them specifically to assist them to meet their difficulties. That will help them properly to police and control the parks.

When a licence is granted, we cannot say to the dog owner, "You must produce a veterinary certificate which states that your dog has been wormed." Perhaps that would be too expensive a requirement to put upon dog owners, although it might be a sensible course to take. I have a dog, and I would be only too pleased to give such an undertaking. However, when a licence is issued there should be a requirement that the owner produces a receipt to show that he has bought the appropriate powders. If he has bought them, it is almost inevitable that they will have been used. That requirement would not impose an onerous obligation.

First, we should introduce a licence fee that will make people responsible for their dogs. It is often the dog that is straying that causes trouble. Secondly, a proportion of the revenue so raised should be given to local authorities to assist them to control their parks. Thirdly, there should be some proof that a dog has been properly wormed. If these steps are taken, the tragedies that we have experienced in Blackpool will not recur.

4.42 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I agree with much that the hon. and learned Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell) has said, but I shall not take up his remarks because I wish to refer to two other matters and I do not want to waste too much of the time of the House.

The Select Committee questioned officials of the Department of the Environment about the right-to-buy scheme for tenants of charitable housing associations. The scheme was introduced under the terms of the Housing and Building Control Act 1984. It involves tenants of charitable housing associations who are not able to purchase the accommodation in which they currently reside being able to purchase accommodation on the private market with a grant from the housing association which is equivalent to the discount which they would have received if they had been council tenants or the tenants of a non-charitable housing association exercising their right to buy their present dwelling.

I asked the officials to tell me how much money was laid aside in the Estimates for the cost of the grants and where the money was to come from. The response from the officials was unsatisfactory. I have it in print in front of me. It reads:

"The cost of the discounts under this scheme is met by Exchequer grant in the form of a housing association grant paid to the housing association through which the tenant arranges his purchase. Provision for it forms a small part, not specifically identified, of the overall provision for housing association grant in subhead E1 of class VII, 1."

That means that the provision of money for grants to tenants of charitable housing associations exercising their rights under the scheme comes directly from the pool of money that is available to housing associations for the development of new and improved property to rent. In other words, the amount of money is crucial. We are told that the cost of the grants is only a small part of the overall provision, and it appears that no specific estimate is made of the cost of the scheme. This is a crucial issue, because the cost of the scheme will be deducted from the overall sum that is made available for association grant purposes by the associations for the development of new and improved property.

I hope that the Minister will be able to give us some rather more satisfactory answers than those which were given by his officials. I invite him to tell us how much money is expected to be paid under housing association grants to tenants of housing associations who are not able to purchase the accommodation in which they are living and who purchase on the private market. I hope that he will give us the total for this year and the sum that is expected to be paid next year. The issue is crucial for the purpose of housing association development this year and next.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that everyone who moves out of a charitable housing association flat or house creates a vacancy by taking advantage of the scheme? Each vacancy is created at much less cost to the Exchequer than the building of a new flat or house. In creating lettings for the associations, the scheme provides a cheap alternative that offers value for money.

Mr. Smith: I accept some of the premises in the hon. Gentleman's intervention, although he leaves out of account the calculation of mortgage tax relief, for example, which will become available to the person or family who move into the private sector. The person who moves out will obtain a mortgage and will be entitled to the relief which he is not receiving currently. The equation is rather more complicated than the simple formulation which the hon. Gentleman presented, but his basic proposition is correct.

If a family, an individual or a group of people move out of a unit of accommodation and that unit becomes available for letting by the charitable housing association, a vacancy will be created at less cost to the Exchequer than the building of a new flat or house. However, money will have been taken out of the overall pool that is available for the development of new accommodation and new schemes. That worries many housing associations and those who are waiting for association accommodation. I hope that we shall have some serious and sensible answers in response to this small but important issue.

The Government have not been spending very much money on housing over the past few years. I tabled a parliamentary question about a year and a half ago seeking comparative figures. My question asked the Government to use a base date of 1977. I accept that the trend has been similar under Governments of both political persuasions, as I am sure the Minister will hasten to remind us. Nevertheless, the graph has steepened under the present Government. I asked the Government to start with a base date of 1976-77 and to state, against a figure of 100, what had happened to elements of Government expenditure from that base date. The answer revealed that under almost all headings public expenditure was within the 90 to 110 level. Some items of expenditure had decreased slightly and some had increased slightly.

There has been a dramatic increase in public expenditure on defence and social security. The social security increases are a direct result of the amount of unemployment benefit that is paid out. In one respect alone there has been a dramatic fall from 100 to 30—a cut to less than a third. That was housing.

The record of the past 10 years is not a proud one. We can see the results throughout Britain. Houses and flats are in an appalling condition, with people having to live in damp, mouldy, difficult, overcrowded accommodation without any hope of being able to move out into something better for themselves and their children. Many people throughout Britain, including my constituency, are having to endure those difficulties.

About a month ago the Minister for Housing and Construction went to Islington to see some of the housing conditions for himself. He saw what the local authority, against all the odds—in the face of continuing cuts in the housing investment programme and constraints on capital expenditure—has assiduously been trying to do. In many cases it has been producing good accommodation, but it is able to do far too little in the face of the enormous problems of those who need accommodation.

Even if the Under-Secretary of State and his civil servants are not prepared to admit that the overall levels of HIP allocations are too low—they have consistently not been prepared to accept this—and to admit that the constraints on the spending of capital receipts are an economic absurdity and a cruel deceit for the people living in inadequate and insubstantial accommodation, perhaps they will accept that some specific problem areas need a specific allocation of funds.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I note what my hon. Friend is saying about housing stock in his borough of Islington. His borough has partnership status and is the seventh most deprived local authority area in England, whereas my borough of Newham is the second most deprived area and has neither partnership nor programme status. Is that fair?

[Mr. Tony Banks]

Mr. Smith: I would certainly not advocate swapping Islington's partnership status for Newham's position. I know Newham well—of course, not as well as I know Islington—and am well aware of the urban dereliction there, the difficulties that face the people and the need for special Government attention and assistance. I look forward to the day when we have a Government who are more clear-sighted and humane than the present Government and who will not only pay attention to those problems in Newham, but will pay more assiduous attention to the problems in Islington, despite its partnership status.

I draw the attention of the Under-Secretary of State to five specific problem areas where housing subsidy is inadequate and where the Government could undertake to give special assistance without necessarily breaching their overall approach to the HIP allocation system. I have tried so often in the past to convince the Government that this is a good cause, and failed, that I am rapidly giving up any hope that the Government will bend on this matter.

First, the Government have been happy to rush legislation through the House to deal with housing defects in non-traditional blocks which have been badly, inadequately and dangerously built, to protect the interests of those tenants who have availed themselves of the right to buy and bought flats in such blocks, but they have not been prepared to recognise the difficulties and needs of the tenants in such blocks. Perhaps the Government are now giving some consideration to their needs and wishes.

Secondly, the Government have consistently refused to acknowledge that asbestos in large quantities in large blocks, many of which were built during the 1950s and 1960s, is dangerous and should be removed, in the interests of the safety and health of the residents. They have refused to acknowledge that local authorities face a special difficulty in ensuring that the asbestos is removed properly and quickly. The Government have not been prepared to consider an ad hoc system of special grants for the removal of asbestos where it is found by the local authority. I am sure that local authorities would be prepared to have a system of Department of the Environment approval when the Department deems that to be necessary. Surely it would be more sensible to do that rather than leave local authorities with the job of having to meet the removal costs from their overall existing housing programmes. A special system should be implemented as quickly as possible to remove asbestos where it is dangerous.

The third problem area is the inter-war estates. During his visit to Islington the Minister for Housing and Construction visited some of the inter-war estate blocks which have been renovated and transformed under the council's imaginative programme. I think that he was impressed. In assessing the housing needs of a particular area, the Government should recognise the considerable cost incurred by local authorities in transforming old blocks into better accommodation.

Fourthly, the Government should consider the number of homeless people who apply every year to the local authorities for housing. The Government will say that this is taken account of in the general needs index. The pressure on many inner city boroughs to provide housing is becoming so acute, especially in those boroughs which have resorted to using sordid and inadequate bed-and-breakfast accommodation, that they are often able to deal with only the problem of the homeless and not the needs of the other people in their areas who need better housing conditions. I hope that the Government will pay attention to that problem, which affects some parts of Britain more dramatically than others.

Fifthly, I hope that the Government will give some recognition, not just to the non-traditional blocks but to the blocks that were constructed in concrete in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, where people are living in damp conditions and condensation is running down the walls. As any hon. Member who represents an inner city area will know, people are living in inadequate, poorly heated and poorly insulated accommodation which needs major renovation work if it is to be made a decent place in which to live.

The Government are taking no account of those problems in the housing investment programme allocations, in their capital restraints or in any of their housing policies. Even if they want to keep the lid on public expenditure, they must realise that there are specific problems and that people are suffering tragically and need the concern, care and attention not just of their local authority, but of the Government, who control the nation's purse strings. I hope that the Government will give us some mileage today to show that, for once, they are awake to the fact that hundreds of thousands of families with children are living in appalling, substandard, inadequate and degrading accommodation. These people need something better and they are waiting for the Government to take action.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute briefly to the debate. I am glad to speak after the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) who always makes challenging speeches with great authority. I also join in congratulating the Chairman of the Environment Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), whose diligence is exceeded only by his qualities of chairmanship in the scrutiny of these Estimates, which are a less glamorous but vitally necessary part of the work of the Committee.

I should like first to deal with that part of class VIII vote 3 which relates to urban development corporations and specifically to refer to the London Docklands development corporation. Under class VIII vote 3 there is an allocation of approximately £50·7 million for the corporation. That is one of the best possible investments of public money. It is marvellous to behold the regeneration taking place in this eight square miles of our capital city. It is not simply a matter of redeveloping land or converting warehouses or building new homes. The corporation is making superb environmental use of the greatest natural asset of the area —the Thames and its docklands.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Chapman: I shall give way shortly. I will continue with what I hope is not a peroration but a few facts. I will then give way to the hon. Gentleman as he is the leader of our county council. The LDDC development must be seen in the context of the great public service infrastructure. The docklands light railway is a most interesting enterprise and £15 million is to be provided for that from the Estimates, towards a total cost of about £70 million. I am pleased that rapid progress is being made on that enterprise and I acknowledge the Government's commitment in giving the go-ahead for the STOLport.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) has touched on a subject that is very close to my heart and close to the interests of the residents of Newham. He mentioned that the LDDC was building houses. He must be aware that the majority of people living in Newham cannot afford to buy houses in the LDDC area. The Government have used the resources invested in the LDDC area as a reason for not allowing the borough of Newham partnership status. The 6 per cent. of Newham residents who live in the docklands area reap no benefit from the LDDC's activities.

Mr. Chapman: I think that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is being slightly short-sighted. I bow to the hon. Gentleman's authority and knowledge of the area, but in my view the whole thrust of the provision of housing in the docklands is to cater for all income groups as far as is practicably possible. Various docklands trust schemes have been set up, as well as the more conventional and recently introduced concept of equity sharing, and these provide opportunities for people to start the process of home ownership on quite modest means in that part of our capital city.

The hon. Gentleman's intervention gives me the opportunity to stress that what is taking place in the LDDC area is a classic example of what should happen in redevelopment—a marriage between private enterprise and public authorities. I am sure that co-operation is also happening in the Merseyside development corporation. Both private enterprise and public authorities bring their own special skills to the benefit of one another and to the satisfaction of the community.

Although the estimate for the next year's public expenditure programme for the LDDC area is £50·7 millions, there is little doubt that previous expenditure, with this expenditure and future expenditure, is primarily responsible for bringing in private development. Private companies have already committed themselves to commercial and industrial development to the value of £140 million in the LDDC area. Four thousand homes have been started or completed and 180 new firms have come into the area since 1981, creating 4,000 new jobs.

I have one query — not a criticism — about the relatively high level of expenditure allocated to administration and salaries for administration staff—20 per cent. of the £50·7 million total. I am told that those figures may not be correct. If they are not, someone must be held to account for providing misleading figures. Administration costs will necessarily be high because of the area in which the development is taking place. That £10 million of public money for administration should be seen in the context of private investment as well as public commitment.

Mr. Alton: The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) has highlighted the argument by the Chairman of the Select Committee about the need to monitor and evaluate the success of the LDDC and the Merseyside development corporation. An important difference between the two development corporations is that private enterprise has been successful in building homes in the LDDC area whereas no home provision has been made in the MDC area. Would it not be practical for the MDC to follow in the footsteps of the LDDC and to build houses?

Mr. Chapman: I acknowledge that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) has greater experience of the MDC. I can speak with more authority about the LDDC than about the MDC. Home provision has proved to be a staggering success and that concept should be extended to other conurbations. I once wrote a very modest paper—so modest that it received little attention —pointing out that 15 years ago there was a case for earmarking certain areas of, for example, London, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow, to create special priority areas and so concentrate resources to redevelop and renovate and show what can be done.

My second point relates to the housing subsidies mentioned by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. Class VII vote 1 relates to housing improvement grants. It is not all gloom and doom in this sector of housing subsidies. I took the precaution of checking the figures. In 1978-79—I do not know why I chose that year—£90 million was spent on housing improvements grants. By 1983-84 the total outturn was £933 million. Last year it had gone down to £778 million. Nevertheless, these figures show that there has been a massive increase in resources devoted to one type of housing subsidy. Improvement grants are, by any criterion, a most cost-effective way to renovate, refurbish and rehabilitate our housing stock—and they provide jobs.

I welcome the publication of the Green Paper, not because I think it has the complete answer or is an end in itself, but because it will create a framework for a better system for the most effective use of the significant resources devoted to this part of housing subsidy. There is a great case for ensuring, far more effectively than we have hitherto, that those resources go to the households that need them, rather than right across the board, irrespective of need.

I turn finally to the whole question of capital expenditure, which covers all the classes and votes which are the subject of the various motions. According to what I was told recently, under the present Government, whereas current expenditure has increased in real terms by 8 per cent., capital expenditure has decreased by 4 per cent. in real terms. I know that capital expenditure decreased even more dramatically in the previous period, but that shows that the Government were starting from a low base.

We must have a much more intelligently planned rolling expansion programme for our capital investment. We have managed to do it in defence and in the Health Service, so I cannot see why it should be beyond the wit of Government to try to isolate capital expenditure programmes from the general thrust of demand-led current expenditure in particular.

The capital investment in the nation's infrastructure is cost effective, and I do not see why the Government cannot announce that next year there will be an increase of X per cent. in real terms and the following year a further increase of, say 1 per cent. beyond that, and stick rigorously to it.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): I wonder whether my hon. Friend, in his well-intentioned enthusiasm, is losing sight of one point. The capital expenditure programmes to which he is referring are often assumed to be labour-intensive and therefore helpful in regard to unemployment. Will my hon. Friend accept that most of the capital expenditure programmes in construction and environment are anything but labour-intensive? Will he concede that point?

Mr. Chapman: I concede it partly, in the sense that I withdraw the remark if I made it, but I do not think I said that I was advocating an expansion of capital investment programmes in the construction industry in particular because it was the most cost-effective way of providing employment. I am sorry if my hon. Friend thought I said that; I do not think that I did. What I said earlier was that increasing housing improvement grants is one of the most effective ways of providing employment in the construction industry.

But I go further and suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) and, respectfully, to the House that what is important is not only the level of investment in the infrastructure programme of the construction industry but that the construction industry should know what it is so that it can plan ahead to try to achieve it.

The House will know of my particular interest in construction and in the environment. I hope that the Government will find a more intelligent way of dealing with the programme for the construction industry, which is still our greatest industry, whether measured in terms of output or manpower.

5.13 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): It is not often that I am able to say that I agree with part—if not all—of a speech by a Conservative Member, but I agree with the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) in regard to housing improvement grants and their consequential effect on employment locally. I am pleased that it is not only Opposition Members who are calling the Minister's attention to that matter. Great difficulties are being encountered in the attempts to improve housing in my constituency and in the area of the Rotherham metropolitan borough, and at the same time there is tremendous pressure on the housing investment programme.

I wish to refer to two matters in the Estimates, one of which relates to housing. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) spoke about the way in which the Housing Defects Bill was rushed through the House last year. I should like to draw attention to the plight of people living in defective houses. They have seen the Government introducing legislation to deal with the problem which has arisen when people have bought a pig in a poke, but the Government have done nothing to give local authorities the ability to repair such houses, if indeed they are repairable.

Hundreds of people in my constituency have bought housing direct from the Rotherham metropolitan borough council or from other public bodies in my constituency, such as the National Coal Board. They are still waiting for the Minister to introduce a proper reinstatement programme for Reema and Tarran houses, or alternatively to give money to my local authority for the repurchase of those houses if they cannot be reinstated.

The local authority is incurring expense in finding out exactly the plight of people and whether they would like to have their houses repurchased. I have in my hand six A4 size pages which were sent out in desperation by Rotherham metropolitan borough council, in May of this year, to tell the people who bought houses which are designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984 that at present very little can be done for them, apart from asking them to write to the council describing their circumstances, so that the council can decide whether such cases can be deemed to be emergencies and bought back.

When the Act was passed, Rotherham council was told that there would be money available, although the assurance was not very specific. The Government's role in making money available for housing in Rotherham in the past five years has been a diminishing one. This year, the council has been able to build only 60 bungalows. That is in an area with a population of over 250,000. In the late 1970s, Rotherham was in the proud position that within a fortnight people could move into new homes if they were unable to buy on the private market. Since public authorities started to sell houses, the vast majority of people in my area have been unable to buy them.

Not only has the council had to reduce its house building programme, but under the housing investment programme it cannot repair council house stock that needs repair. In addition, the council has not been given any money for the repurchase or reinstatement of houses designated under the Act.

I understand that in May of this year the local authorities submitted information on what they deemed would be the cost of implementing the Housing Defects Act. I urge the Minister to tell the House whether any decision has been taken in relation to Rotherham and other areas which have a large number of defective houses on their hands. Can he tell my council when it will get the money, so that it can write to the people concerned and tell them exactly where they stand?

In introducing the Housing Defects Bill, the Government, to put it mildly, put the cart before the horse. Hundreds of my constituents still do not know what is to happen. Some of them have had "For Sale" notices in their front gardens for over two years. Some people have been trying to sell houses and move up the housing market, but they have been denied the opportunity to do so. Although there is an Act, there is still no money for my local authority to carry out the legislation. I hope that the Minister will move quickly.

Class VIII, vote 2, relates to grants to the British Waterways Board. For the first time since becoming a Member of the House, I have had to write to the board this week because of a decision that it has taken. I give credit where it is due, and I give it to the Government for their decree that all uses of canals should be reviewed. The board has said that, for 12 months, it must remove the rights of Kiveton Park angling club to fish in the Chesterfield canal in the south of my constituency. The club has had that right since 1909. It has received a letter from the board stating that the review must be enforced, even though fishing rights may be restored after 12 months.

When aid is given to the British Waterways Board, the fact that the canals are not only used for transport but are a source of recreation should be taken into account. The South Yorkshire canal, which flows into Rotherham, has been used for many years for transport, but other canals, such as the Chesterfield canal, are used for fishing. I ask the Minister to realise that recreational facilities on canals are important for many organisations and people. I hope that the Minister, under the aid given in the vote, will ensure that the recreational facilities and the need to improve canals are taken into account.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): It is not just a matter of improving canals, but of maintaining them. In Scotland, canals are deteriorating quickly. Farmers in my constituency took me round last month to see the number of leaks in the deteriorating Victorian puddling. A huge amount of work is required to keep them in their present condition, let alone to improve them. Is the same problem developing after 150 years in my hon. Friend's constituency?

Mr. Barron: My hon. Friend has raised a good point. I am not always in favour of them, but many voluntary organisations and canal societies have been working for generations to stop the natural erosion of canals. When money must be spent and there is a lot of work to be done, that work cannot be done by voluntary organisations. The Minister must recognise that any provisions for expenditure must cater for the leisure side as well as for transport, which is already well catered for.

I would hate to suggest that all that the unemployed in my area have to do is to go fishing. There is a massive problem of youth unemployment in my constituency. If we cannot find them work, we have a responsibility to find them something to do, even if that means providing leisure pursuits on the canal. When the Minister is considering aid to the British Waterways Board, he must keep that in mind at all times.

5.23 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw your attention to column 1079, of yesterday's Official Report, where some singularly ill-founded remarks seek in rather pathetic fashion to wax critical of a Labour authority in the north-east. The fact that they are critical does not disturb me unduly, even though they are unjustified. However, they are attributed to me. I seek your guidance on how to have my name removed from such a pathetic effort.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that there has been an error in the report of what he said?

Mr. Cook: No, Sir. The statement is attributed to me, but I have no association with it. I was present at the time, but seated on the opposite side of the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall make inquiries into that, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for drawing my attention to it.

5.24 pm

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): For many environmentalists this year has been the year of the badger; for others, the focus has been on ancient monuments and the heritage, with anxious reference to Stonehenge. My remarks will relate to derelict land and urban renewal.

It is the contention of many of us from the provincial conurbations that the control of urban sprawl into the countryside is merely the converse of the more serious problems of deprivation, demoralisation and evacuation of the older central urban areas. The interests of those who would wish to see a denial of green field development as a soft option, and the interests of those who wish to see new resources put into inner-city areas converge. They are the same interests. In all the big provincial conurbations, an enormous consensus of political will is available to the Government should they wish to draw the fairly simple conclusion that has been circulating for some time: the political interests of the periphery of our provincial conurbations, usually in the hands of the Conservative party, and those of the older urban centres, usually in the hands of the Labour party, are the same.

In my constituency, there is a sincere and genuine desire to halt the sprawl into the green field countryside. There is a genuine belief that if resources are denied to constituencies such as mine, they should be made available in the central Birmingham and the central midlands conurbations, where the fabric is badly rundown and those resources are needed. When the Minister considers class VIII, vote 3, I hope that he will bear my points in mind. He will have a ready audience if he does so.

The green field soft option is easier for the developer than the hard, difficult urban site, such as the Saltley gasworks in Birmingham, which has underground, broken-down brickwork and poisoned earth to a considerable depth. Clearly, that site is the harder option. Initiatives must be taken to make the difficult site an attractive proposition to the developer. In this context, as other hon. Members have said, the development corporations have been an outstanding success. Development corporations have cut through and succeeded in difficult urban sites such as Merseyside and the London docklands. Even those of us who have spent a long time in local government are driven to the conclusion that development corporations often succeed because they can override local government and do not get clogged and fettered by its traditional mechanisms, which, although well-intended, are sometimes leaden-footed, negative and unhelpful.

In terms of ownership, much of the redundant land and demoralised sites in the urban conurbations are languishing in public ownership at unrealistic book values, which could have been designed to repel any interested inquirer. Such sites may be on the books of the British Waterways Board, public service undertakings, British Rail or even local authorities. People are inhibited by those unrealistic book values from putting such sites on the market. Would the Minister give some thought to a more enlightened or cavalier technique? If that brought results it might be worth the effort. Why do we not get the local authorities to acquire those sites compulsorily, at whatever price, and award comprehensive planning permissions to the sites? They could spend some money making them attractive and auction them for whatever price they will fetch. There would be only one proviso to the purchaser — whatever he chooses to do within the umbrella planning permission he should put the work in hand within a limited time. I cannot see who would be the loser from such an initiative. There would be some loss of money on the book values of publicly owned property, but those are unreal assets and perhaps the sooner they are written off the better. If what I have suggested is practical, so much the better.

I shall conclude by explaining my intervention in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet

[Mr. John Mark Taylor]

(Mr. Chapman). I am anxious that we should not raise false hopes. Every right hon. and hon. Member is naturally anxious about unemployment and would like to think that there is a connection between spending more money on construcion and alleviating some unemployment. It would be irresponsible for any Member to raise false hopes. We should all take account of two important discounts. The first is that many major construction programmes are not labour intensive. The second—I am afraid that this example is anecdotal and a rather cautionary tale—relates to a conversation that I had recently with a major civil engineering contractor from the Wolverhampton area. He had one of the final stages of the M54 contract, the Telford motorway, just north of Wolverhampton. He advertised in Wolverhampton where unemployment is high for men to work at good pay on the final stages of the motorway. There was no take up from that advertising campaign. That civil engineering contractor was puzzled and anxious about the reasons for that lack of response.

In the closing days of the West Midlands county council, I should like to say that its forays into healing derelict land has been one of its successes. I contrast that with one of its more recent initiatives when it decided to go to Dublin to discover why Irish tinkers come to Britain. That decision was given some publicity recently. The matter comes within the ambit of the debate. The authority did not have to go so far to find the answers. I am sad that in its late stages, that authority should approach the difficult problem of tinkers and gipsies in that far-flung and self-indulgent way.

The Minister may not be competent to address that matter, but I am looking forward to his reply. I am sure that I shall enjoy it as much as I enjoyed the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), the Chairman of the Select Committee.

5.32 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Those of us who are not members of the Select Committee are probably in a better position than those who are, to thank our colleagues of all parties who are members. The House does not pay sufficient attention to the hard work that they do. Whatever their conclusions, it behoves those of us who benefit from the work to say thank you.

It is normal to excuse oneself for not following a previous speaker, but I should like to follow the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor). We are discussing matters quietly, and I believe that there is an important and serious point to be made about what he said. I must concede that there is some truth in the fact that it is easy to say, "Yes, let us have public expenditure. Let us spend on infrastructure and there will be many more jobs." That case is rather spoilt by exaggerration, but I believe that there is a great deal of potential work in many projects.

One or two colleagues and I were told last year by the Institution of Civil Engineers that for every £100 million spent on sewers at least £55 million would return to the Exchequer in one form or another. The point relates to social accounting. The Severn-Trent water authority representative argued that although one had to take with a pinch of salt the amount of employment that would be created—I agree with that—by sewer reconstruction, if more people were employed that would result in less unemployment benefit being paid, more people paying taxes and more prosperous firms. That catalogue is familiar to the House. Less would also be paid in national insurance, housing benefit and various other benefits. A major sewer programme is needed, because hardly a week goes by without us reading in our local newspapers of major roads crumbling over Victorian sewers. If one takes account of the social cost, is a major sewer reconstruction programme as costly as is made out?

I should have liked to be a fly on the wall at the Cabinet meeting this morning which discussed the Government's public expenditure problems. I hope that some Ministers—I do not like to put it this way—had the wit to ask what the cost of a major programme would be. I agree with the hon. Member for Solihull that a case can be brought into disrepute by being over-egged, but, nevertheless is there not something to be said for major capital programmes? How much do they cost? How much will doing something about the waterways cost?

I am one of the few Labour Members who represent a large number of farmers. During the rainy weather last month I was taken around some waterways by friends of mine who are farmers. Mr. Sandy Manson of the Pardovan farm near a canal between Edinburgh and Glasgow showed me point after point where the canal was leaking.

The time has passed for minor repairs or patching. Civil servants at the Scottish Office or the Department of the Environment who are involved with the environment must understand that sooner or later the problem must be tackled. Every five years that passes, the problem worsens. The clay and the puddling deteriorate. The Victorians built well, but the canals cannot be expected to last for ever. At some time, someone, somewhere, will have to do something about them. What is true of Scotland is true of south Northumberland and north Durham, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) knows well. I suspect that the problem is repeated in south Yorkshire, Birmingham and Wolverhampton.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a further point, which is perhaps rather better illustrated by the analogy of motorways than canals? If we spend 2 per cent. more on motorway construction than is being spent at the moment, motorways will last for considerably longer. If we put more money into quality construction, it lasts longer and therefore less has to be spent on repairs.

Mr. Dalyell: I endorse that point strongly. Last Friday week, Scottish Labour Members were guests of the RAC and AA in Glasgow. They made the point that there had been skimping—I shall not bore the House with the details—on some of the motorway foundations. We are reaping endless trouble from that. This raises the issue of road repairs and potholes and the fact that if repairs are not done roads will deteriorate.

I strongly agree with the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on the question of housing. The city of Glasgow has worked miracles in the past five years. When people see what can be done to raise the row by relatively small sectors that are "outstanding", to use the word of the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet, great advances can be made.

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): I have listened to my hon. Friend, and surely he agrees that the converse is also true. Local authorities are unable to complete the clearing of an area to build better houses because of Government cuts in housing. People are left in limbo because they cannot pay the compensation necessary to clear the area, and instead of making improvements the area is left like a battlefield.

Mr. Dalyell: It is awful when the job of clearing cannot be finished. My hon. Friend knows more about housing policy than I do, so I simply endorse what he says. When there is not the money to finish the job, it is extremely wasteful over a period of time.

I represent a fairly small local authority, West Lothian district council, with which I have an excellent relationship and for which I have the greatest respect. Even a small authority such as that needs £190 million to £200 million for necessary repairs. That does not include luxuries or frivolous work, as was confirmed by the director of finance, Mr. Stanley Stirton, and others. Those may seem staggering sums, but I return to the social calculations. Such repair work will take people off the unemployment register. Bearing in mind the cost of unemployment and housing benefits, and the potential income from national insurance and extra taxes, how much does it cost to employ people when we have 25 per cent. or so unemployed and the possible withdrawal of British Leyland, Bathgate and the closure of the Polkemmet pit?

These are urgent issues for a community such as I represent. I hope that during this quiet debate we can have a reflective answer from a reflective Minister, who has not been afraid to speak his mind on other matters.

The work that could be done if more funds were given to the Historic Buildings Council for Scotland is also labour intensive. I am told that if the £22 million for the national heritage memorial fund under class VIII, vote 4 were doubled, contractors could employ far more young people in the traditional crafts such as stonemasonry, lead piping, lead roofing and the rather difficult plumbing in an old building. Moreover, a great deal of the money which would be paid out would return to the Exchequer.

I went on a brief visit with the Historic Buildings Council to Methuen castle three weeks ago. The contractors I met there explained at great lenght the need for a little more money and said that they could then go ahead with more projects. That would create a difference in employment in rural areas.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that many of the heritage and conservation programmes are indeed labour intensive. I make that intervention to balance what I said earlier.

Mr. Dalyell: In a sense, there is cross-party agreement on this matter. I hope that Ministers will note that and reflect on it.

Class VIII, vote 4 relates to redundant churches. Something must be done, and quickly. The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) and I have been on heritage visits together. He knows exactly what the problem is. Time is often not on our side when the fabric is deteriorating.

Class VIII, vote 2 refers to the additional responsibilities taken on by the Nature Conservancy Council. I have asked this question before. Because of what has been learnt at Halvergate and elsewhere, has not the time come when, rather than pay out money to people who are doing what they ought not to be doing, we should consider listing sites of scientific or special interest in relation to nature reserves, such as we automatically accept for buildings?

It is difficult to make the point properly during Question Time, but the matter came up yesterday during Environment questions. It is all very well for the Minister to say that £50 an acre is being paid out all over Halvergate, but that represents quite a bit of money if it is repeated throughout Britain. Is this really a proper thing to do? Is it not time that the Government considered listing?

Class VIII, vote 3 deals with derelict land. It is extraordinary that, so long after 1945, and unlike any other country in Europe, there seems to be derelict land in all of our constituencies. I am a passionate believer in local authorities. Could not some policy be worked out with them to enable them to do something about the problem? Here again, the solution is labour intensive.

I shall not trespass on the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), but those of us who have the problem of travelling people in our constituencies feel that more could be done to provide them with sites. It is an extremely sensitive issue. The attitude in my constituency is, "Yes, we must have facilities for travelling people, but not next to me." That is a familiar feeling. Problems are created, however, by the failure to provide facilities.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) came on board the royal research ship Charles Darwin—I was glad to see him there—when some of us were invited to do so by the Natural Environment Research Council. It is just by HMS Belfast in the pool of London. Although I am relating the problem to class VIII, vote 5, the problem is that many Departments are involved. Professor Sir Malcolm Brown, the head of Keyworth, explained that his work is made difficult because it depends partly on the Department of the Environment, partly on the Department of Education and Science and partly on the Ministry of Defence, so consideration goes all around Whitehall.

If the Minister says that my question must be answered by the Department of Education and Science I shall not quarrel about it, but I would like to know about the ocean drilling programme. It is a matter of shame to our country if we cannot afford the candidate membership of that programme. We were to have been partners with the United States, Canada, Japan, France and Germany. We have a great deal of expertise, and all those who went on the Charles Darwin must have been impressed by the well-known international calibre of British scientists working in this area of activity. Something should be done.

The Wildlife and Countryside Act features in the Estimates. Endless time was occupied in Committee discussing marine nature reserves. Having recently visited the marine biological laboratory at Plymouth and talked to the director, I understand that there are problems at Penzance and Lundy. I suspect that the marine nature reserves have not got off the ground, partly because of the resistance of fishermen. They are afraid that the inspectors are connected with Her Majesty's inspectors of taxes. The last people the fishermen want to see are tax inspectors. Has the Department of the Environment any view to offer about the delay at Lundy and in the Scillies and, as a Scot, more urgently for me, about the fiasco of St. Abb's Head? Furthermore, it is most important that something should be done fairly soon about Loch Sween.

[Mr. Dalyell]

I put down a question yesterday about the Property Services Agency:

"To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, if he will give a breakdown of the £89 million required for the progress of the Mount Pleasant airport in the Falklands after 1 June."

In his reply the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment said:

"It is not the practice to disclose rates for particular components of Government contracts, but I can say that essentially the sum covers the balance of work to complete the secondary runway, aircraft apron, roads, buildings and services, together with the site clearance of temporary facilities when construction ceases and the usual provisions for retention pending the expiry of maintenance periods on work already completed."—[Official Report, 10 July 1985.]

I wonder, as my hon. Friends on the Front Bench may wonder, what would have happened to Liverpool, Lambeth and some of the other local authorities in London if they had suddenly decided to spend £89 million? Yet this happened without a cheep. The Falklands expenditure is sacrosanct. No local authority could get away with expenditure of that kind.

Mr. Cowans: They would have been rate capped.

Mr. Dalyell: As my hon. Friend says, they would have been rate capped. What is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander. Time after time I used to bore people stiff—[Hon. Members: "Never."]—by asking about the cost of the airport. Even those civil servants who should not be here are laughing. Every time the answer, carefully costed, was that it would cost no more than £215 million and that there would be absolute cost control.

Mr. Tony Banks: My hon. Friend never bores the House by drawing attention to the peculiarly perverted values of the Government about Falkland Islands expenditure. Does he accept that if the money that was spent on the airport in the Falklands had been used in the London borough of Newham, it would have solved its housing problems?

Mr. Dalyell: This has come to be known as the Margaret Thatcher international airport. Its financial history is revealing. It started at £215 million. Time after time the cost was said to be £215 million. Then it edged up to £240 million. By some alchemy, it then rose to £360 million. From 1 June another £89 million had to be added. We also find that the "wide awake" airport at Ascension Island is to cost another £49 million. The cost is already over £500 million and it is edging steadily upwards. What has happened to the monitoring of PSA expenditure? All that the Under-Secretary of State, who is a nice man, can do is to give a watery smile. If I were talking nonsense, he would be down my throat. There is one law for military expenditure and another for local authority expenditure. It is not a sensible way to run a country.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): Tempted though I am to follow in some detail the breadth and depth of this debate, I shall return to some of the issues that were raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi).

On the Department of the Environment Estimates, the mobility ratio of local authority housing is very important if we are to encourage those who might wish to seek jobs in the more prosperous parts of the country to move. It is not just a question of increasing the percentage of stock that is put aside from 1 per cent. to perhaps 2 per cent., important though that is. What worries me is that many authorities do not participate in the mobility scheme. I single out in particular Scottish local authorities. Scotland has higher than average unemployment. One might think that there would be a ready willingness to co-operate with other local authorities by asking them to make available a percentage of their stock. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will consider how the mobility scheme could be strengthened.

My second point, on improvement grants, was mentioned not only by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green but by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) and the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). There has been a massive increase in expenditure on improvement grants. A more discriminatory policy in terms of need is appropriate but it is a much more complex problem than that. In the prosperous parts of the south-east it is common for the price of houses that need to be improved to be inflated, in the sure and certain knowledge that the purchaser will be able to secure an improvement grant. In such areas as north-east Lancashire, however, where the average price of a house is much lower, an improvement grant may result in an even lower price being obtained on the open market. A loan system may work in some areas but not in others. I hope that this point will be taken into account during both this discussion and subsequent discussions on the Green Paper.

As for canals, I have to declare an interest as a member of the amenity advisory council of the Inland Waterways Association and as the chairman of the all-party waterways group. Having press-ganged the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) into becoming secretary of the group, I am pleased that he has spoken on the subject so soon after his appointment. I hope that we shall hear often from him on the subject. It is only fair to say that the Government have increased substantially the resources of the British Waterways Board. That has enabled it to clear up the backlog of work and make improvements. This is already evident in many projects. However, the BWB could do much more to help itself.

My hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) referred to the use of redundant land. That is true of other under-utilised assets. An example is Lock Cottage at Cow Roast in my constituency which is tenanted by Mr. and Mrs. Kent. When it offered to sell the cottage, the BWB's valuation was £65,000. I sought three other valuations from professional valuers in the area. The average valuation was £45,000. As my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull said, that is typical. The BWB did not want the valuation to be carried out by an independent valuer. I suggested that somebody should be appointed by the Incorporated Society of Valuers and Auctioneers. However, the BWB was determined not to realise that asset.

Finally, I wish to refer to the thorny and vexed question of gipsy sites, which is not as easy as has been suggested. I have served on a local authority — Chiltern district council — which sought and obtained designation. As soon as the expenditure on the sites had been put in hand and we had bright, new and clean gipsy sites, the so-called gipsies moved in and vandalised them and demolished everything that was there. It was totally wasted expenditure. I wonder what value for money we get from some of those schemes.

On the other hand, my own local authority in Dacorum is being flooded by travellers not just from boroughs and districts that have obtained designation but by some people who have been evicted from the Molesworth protest site. We are trying in vain to achieve designation but are frustrated time and again by the changing criteria which reflect the fact that people see our area as a transit camp on the way to getting a site at one of the new official gipsy locations. The whole system of gipsy sites needs to be carefully examined.

With regard to the Property Services Agency Estimates, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green referred to the inadequacy of the local discretion given to managers. A sum of £1,000 is a small sum over which to have jurisdiction when putting out work. That would not be so bad if, as a result, there was not duplication. A local manager, given the opportunity to put out a project for under £1,000, may discover later that, because it has been many years since the application was made and it has only now reached the end of the pipeline, it is being let as part of a major contract. Such duplication occurs far more frequently than the PSA is prepared to admit.

The PSA is a notoriously slow payer and thus it is difficult to attract competitive bids at the local small or major level. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green will give the PSA a firm kick up the backside to make it pay more promptly for the services that it commissions.

Perhaps at this stage the existence of the PSA should be considered and a decision reached on whether it should be divided among other Departments or eradicated. Even if the PSA remains in existence, there is some merit in placing it under an obligation to follow the rules and regulations that govern local authorities under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act. For example, why are local authorities obliged to put out to tender a cross-section of one third of their ordinary maintenance work but the same obligation does not apply to the PSA? That is certainly food for thought when the Minister considers the PSA.

I should like to add my voice to that of many of my colleagues in congratulating our Committee Chairman on the way that he leads us. It is always pleasant to serve on a ship where the captain has a firm hand on the tiller and where he shows such clarity of thought as the present incumbent. In saying that, I am sure that I speak for those of all political parties.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I wish to refer to a few items within the Department of the Environment's Estimates. Dog licences, which are referred to in the Select Committee report, were also mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell).

There is a need to remove the present crazy anomaly whereby the collection of the dog licence fee amounts to more than the revenue from the licence. However, from my own experience in Burnley I have learnt that much controversy surrounds dog issues. I strongly advise that it should not be left to local authorities to determine the amount of the licence fee. There should be a nationally based fee to avoid the inevitable comparisons which would be made if authorities were allowed to set the fee themselves.

I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that the revenue should be used to provide services such as dog wardens, and certainly Burnley would like an additional dog warden. Due to the present Government restraint, it has been unable to employ another warden. Despite the controversies arising in Burnley from the dog ban in certain parks — I stress "certain" because only a relatively small area has been affected by the ban—it is a reasonable compromise which has been overwhelmingly accepted. I believe that the Department of the Environment should consider the matter and give more advice to other authorities that wish to follow in that direction. The advice given could be based on the experiences and problems that we encountered in Burnley, which I believe can be blamed on both the council and the people who opposed that ban. In certain parks children can play on the grass without fear of being covered in dog dirt, which is welcome to many parents, yet in other parks, usually in close proximity, dogs are allowed.

Canals have been referred to in the debate. That is an item of great importance to a constituency such as mine, through which the Leeds and Liverpool canal runs. Lancashire Enterprises Ltd., a subsidiary of Lancashire county council, has formulated a programme to improve the canal and bring it back to standard. That applies only to the section of the canal in the Lancashire county area. The cost of the scheme to revitalise it is the staggering figure of £81 million. The company hopes to fund certain sections of the canal, depending on the areas that it goes through, through urban development grants, the urban programme, Manpower Services Commission schemes and other assistance from the Government. If we are to deal with the important problem of canals and waterways that need urgent attention, we have to ensure that the British Waterways Board and other bodies involved have the necessary resources to tackle it.

Many difficulties arise from all the different aspects of the urban programme. Some of those items are now being considered by the Government. There are many anomalies under the traditional urban programme. Many people are disappointed this year at the allocations that were given to them. It seems a bit of a nonsense to invite all authorities to apply to the urban programme when there are insufficient resources to allocate. It might be more appropriate to concentrate resources on areas of urban deprivation if they are limited.

There are programme authorities, partnership authorities and designated authorities. There are many anomalies among them, too. I, for one, cannot see why expenditure arising under the urban programme can be disregarded for penalty purposes for programme or partnership authorities, but not for designated authorities. To me it is only a matter of degree.

I was surprised when my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said that his borough was not a partnership authority whereas Islington is. That shows the great uncertainty about how authorities are designated. The Under-Secretary will say that there are different categories of local authorities and different headings of deprivation, and one has to be classified under so many of those headings to qualify. However, when one looks at some of the authorities, one stands back and says, "I wonder why that one has managed to achieve that status and the other one has not." Burnley is a designated authority, yet two authorities on either side, Pendle and Hyndburn, which are very similar, do not have that status.

Mr. Tony Banks: I endorse my hon. Friend's comments. It does not make sense to Newham borough council. We look at those authorities close by which are partnership authorities or programme authorities. I do not want anyone to think that I was suggesting that Newham wants to take something away from the surrounding borough, which we know is also deprived. It is very difficult for us to explain to the people of Newham why Tower Hamlets, Islington and Hackney and other nearby boroughs get special support while we do not.

Mr. Pike: My hon. Friend has made the point very well. I take exactly the same view of Blackburn, which is close to Burnley. Those of us in Burnley would not wish Blackburn to lose its higher classification. It is extremely strange that Pendle and Hyndburn have no classification. We need to see whether this programme is catching all the authorities as it should be doing.

On the matter of grants, the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) referred in particular to north-east Lancashire. I referred to that subject in the Select Committee when we were discussing the Estimates. The Government will have to consider carefully the implications of their Green Paper. Too often the Government look at housing as it is in London without looking at valuations and other factors in the provinces. In Manchester and Liverpool, the problems are very different from those only 24 miles away in Burnley, in north-east Lancashire, where property values are much lower. In those areas, if a person improves his house, the selling value, after his own share and the contribution from grants, will be less than the value for which that property could still be sold. That is one reason why council house rents are far too high. We had to increase them because of Government policy, and now semi-detached council houses are empty because people can buy terraced houses far more cheaply.

The Government should consider carefully before making changes in grants. There is abuse, and when the Minister for Housing and Construction came to Burnley last year he saw the problem for himself. He did not go on the exact tour that we had planned, because when we were driving round the streets of Burnley he suddenly said, "Stop the car, I want to get out." He went to the nearest person on the street and said, "I want to see your house." The house he want into proved the very point that the Government should look at closely. It was a house that had been improved on a grant; the grant was insufficient, and the house needed another grant to bring it up to scratch.

The Government should give councils the authority to inspect all work to make sure that contractors carry it out to the proper standard, and they should give councils the financial resources, powers and staff to do that work. Hon. Members on both sides of the House must be anxious to ensure that we get value for money. If the grants system is abused, whether by contractors or by anybody else, we should be concerned about it because it is a waste of public money which could be better used to make sure that other houses are brought up to standard. I accept that this may not be a major problem, but in my area the problem does exist. As I have said, the Minister for Housing and Construction saw it for himself, not through any planning by Burnley borough council, but purely because he stopped the car and wanted to look at a house immediately.

The Opposition have a right to argue about insufficient resources—and resources are insufficient—but I have always accepted that the Government have the right to limit the amount of money available whether we like it or not. My biggest objection is that this Government seem to believe that councils should not have the additional rights to determine at local level what they wish to spend and what additional resources they want to put in. Whichever political party is in government and however much I might disagree with the figure that the Government have fixed, they have a right to say what money they will put in. But councils should be given the freedom to raise money locally to tackle the jobs and problems that they were elected to tackle.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is always a pleasure but a daunting task to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), whose knowledge of local government matters is unrivalled in this House. He was a distinguished leader of Burnley council.

For obvious reasons I should like to speak about the Government's housing policy in London. There must be something wrong with their policy on housing, because the Duke of Edinburgh, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) have all said at different times that the Government have got it wrong. That is a most distinguished trinity of Establishment noses to get up. I hope the Minister is thinking carefully about the critics of housing policy among the Establishment, and not just among the Opposition.

It is arguable that the Government have not one housing policy but two — one for votes and one for public spending. Their votes policy appears to be to spare no expense to encourage or woo people into becoming owner-occupiers in the belief that home owners vote Tory. The policy is matched by a number of Labour Members who seem to think that all council tenants vote Labour. Both concepts are mistaken.

Changing the legal terms under which people occupy their homes does nothing to solve our housing problems. Put simply, there are not enough homes to go round and the homes that we have are decaying rapidly. The Government's public spending policy is to concentrate cuts on public investment on housing in order to compensate for their failure to keep other areas of public spending under control. Since 1979-80 London has suffered a cumulative loss of more than £3,000 million, and provision for public investment in London's housing has been chopped by two thirds.

London's housing problems are enormous and grave. The fabric of houses is deteriorating and 640,000 London homes are unsatisfactory. Many of them are in the private sector. Homelessness is increasing. Last year, there were 25,000 homeless families in London, with 3,000 of them in bed and breakfast accommodation. Waiting lists are lengthy; there are 500,000 people on the waiting list in London alone. In 1982 the Government stopped keeping separate figures for unemployed construction workers, but then there were about 40,000 such workers on the dole in London.

Building figures are heading for new lows. Only 4,000 new council homes were started in London last year compared with 25,000 in the mid-1970s. The forecast is that performance will drop still further. The Government are now trying to hush things up hoping that nobody will notice how bad they are. In mid-June, The Guardian reported that, although the Government were committed to another survey in 1986 of the condition of the nation's housing stock, they intend to fiddle the definition of unfit property to make it appear that the situation is not getting worse.

In the Department of the Environment the Minister is seen as the personification of a human punchbag because of the way in which he keeps getting put up to deal with these unpopular subjects. I hope that he will confirm or deny that story which appeared in The Guardian in June. In the six years since the Prime Minister came to office, her Government have made no attempt to discover what the real housing need is, despite repeated requests to do so.

Indeed, it has been left up to the Royal Family. I admit at once that the Duke of Edinburgh is not a person I have always associated with housing need. However, the inquiry into British housing, chaired by the Duke of Edinburgh, found that housing need is a national scandal. On all the international comparisons, we come out bottom of the league. On the number of homes produced per 1,000 inhabitants, we are bottom; on housing investment as a percentage of GDP, we are bottom; on gross fixed residential construction as a proportion of GDP, we are bottom. That list emerged from the Duke of Edinburgh's inquiry, and in each case we came below countries such as Belgium, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Iceland and Ireland as well as the richer western economies.

In 1983 the Conservative manifesto claimed that the Government would make Britain

"the best housed nation in Europe".

It is about time that they explained what happened to that commitment and why that promise has apparently been abandoned.

Class VII, vote 1, relates to general subsidies to local authorities. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) pointed out, this item has been reduced drastically since 1979 when general subsidies to local authorities amounted to £1,300 million. This year they have been cut to £400 million. But in real terms the cut has been that much greater, and the mechanisms have been draconian increases in council house rents and savage cuts in housing programmes that have reduced the rate of creation of new debt.

In a surprisingly frank piece of drafting in the introduction to class VII, vote 1, it admits that the purpose of driving up rents and slashing investment was to drive people into becoming home owners. It states:

"The underlying downward trend of entitlement to section A subsidies reflects the emphasis on increasing home ownership through the sale of council dwellings and lower capital expenditure on new public sector provision."

There is no other justification for that than an ideological one.

Mr. Chris Smith: Will my hon. Friend also note that one of the results of the way in which the Government have forced public sector rents up over the past three or four years has been that throughout the country most housing revenue accounts are now in surplus? That means that rent payers are subsidising the ratepayers. Is not that a gross misuse of rent funds?

Mr. Banks: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend.

The figures in the Estimates are only gross Exchequer subsidies. But according to some sources, services on council houses in many areas result nationally in council housing making a net profit and receiving no subsidy at all. Will the Minister confirm or deny that? A number of Conservative councils — Wandsworth is one — have pushed up rents as a way of transferring money from the publicly rented sector to subsidise those in the private sector as well as ratepayers generally. That is a gross abuse of housing revenue accounts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley said that council rents have been forced up. Since 1979, rents have risen by double the rate of inflation. In that year, average rents in London were £7·93, but by 1984 they had risen to more than £17—an increase of more than 125 per cent. Rising rents contribute to inflation, but that does not seem to concern the Government because in their mind it appears that inflation is unimportant when its effects impinge mainly on council tenants.

The Government will no doubt say that the increases were necessary to catch up on the Labour years when rents fell behind, but they have gone much further than that. Until there was a marginal fall in the last couple of years, they pushed up rents so far that they accounted for a higher proportion of male manual earnings than at any time since the war.

The Government's traditional response has been that rent increases do not matter very much in the council sector because the poor are protected by housing benefits. A total of 65 per cent. of council tenants in Newham receive housing benefits, but the shambles of that system means that the poor have never been protected. Still less will that be true in the future because the Secretary of State for Social Services plans to take £500 million of that benefit away from the poor and the old.

General subsidies also include help towards the cost of managing and maintaining council estates. The effect of cutting back, combined with block grant penalties and rate capping, has been to pressure councils into reducing the number of caretakers and the regularity of maintenance — the very factors that the Department of the Environment has identified as being central to good management. Indeed, the Secretary of State for the Environment had the gall to stand up at the Institute of Housing conference in Harrogate last month and tell local authorities that they had failed their tenants. He announced that he was setting up a new unit, to be called the urban housing renewal unit, to privatise the estates. In fact, the Government have set up a self-fulfilling prophecy.

The Government are obsessed with home ownership at the expense of everything else. They are fond of quoting surveys that show that most people want, and expect, to be home owners. That is hardly surprising, given the choices on offer. Many people now see home ownership as their best bet, and no one denies that owner-occupation has a dominant role to play. However, those who are excluded from home ownership, of whom there are large numbers in London, should not be made to pay such a heavy price.

[Mr. Banks]

I never miss the opportunity to draw the Minister's attention to the housing problem in Newham. The council, together with the Newham Chamber of Commerce, the Newham Voluntary Agencies Council, the Newham Council for Racial Equality, the Newham health authority and the GLC, wrote on 5 July to the Prime Minister and the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry, the Environment, the Home Department, Education and Science, Employment and Social Services. They made out an undeniable case for partnership status for the London borough of Newham. Indeed, the Minister knows that we have an undeniable case, So why does his Department still deny us the undeniable?

There is a severe shortage of homes in my borough. It is currently estimated at almost 3,000. Homelessness is now higher than ever before. More than half the privately owned homes in Newham are unsatisfactory, either through disrepair or a lack of bath or inside toilet.

One tends to associate Labour boroughs with high concentrations of council tenancy, but in my constituency more than 50 per cent. of people are owner-occupiers. However, the houses that they occupy are in grave need of repair — and that terrible problem is being exacerbated by Government policies.

Nearly a quarter of council accommodation is situated in the 112 tower blocks, and more than 800 families with young children who live in those blocks are waiting to be rehoused. We desperately need assistance from the Minister. He knows what is going on in the borough of Newham. He knows the problems associated with Ronan Point and the TWA blocks. What extra assistance will he give to the Newham council to deal with the problems that he knows exist? He has been to the borough and has seen them for himself. When may we expect to be given the partnership status that we so desperately need?

My last point is on class VII, vote 2. It is only a small amount in terms of overall subsidies, but it brings me back to a point which came up during the passage of the Local Government Bill on Monday—when the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) said that he supported the guillotine motion because he wanted to brush out of the way the embarrassment of the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. Let me bring it straight back to the House. In class VII, vote 2, section B1(2) deals with "Discretionary grants and loans towards the cost of arrangements to facilitate public sector tenant mobility under section 46 of the Housing Act 1980."

It provides £75,000. This is the code of the national mobility office — four and a half persons in a semi-quango running the national mobility scheme — which the Government propose should take on the Greater London mobility scheme and the seaside and country homes scheme.

The Estimates show just how absurd that is as a proposal from a Government who believe that the national mobility office is the appropriate body to take on these major functions. The cost of the two GLC schemes is at least 10 times that of the present office of the national mobility scheme. Can the Minister tell us what will be the cost of section B1(2) in 1986-87, since the Government have already made it clear that they will pick up the bill for the Londonwide mobility scheme and for the seaside and country homes scheme. How does that square with the Government's claim that abolition will save money?

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): We are all very grateful to the Select Committee for picking out a number of matters and I do not intend to comment on more than a few, but perhaps I could start with gipsy sites. We all know that gipsies arouse strong feeling. When I have visited a gipsy site I have been given advice in what might be described as unparliamentary language. I thought I had to put my camera in my case rather than somewhere else. When one talks to the neighbours one is often approached in unparliamentary language as well. Nobody denies there is a difficulty about gipsies and travellers, but we need to get it in proportion.

As the Select Committee points out, there are roughly 10,000 travellers — about 20 traveller families per district or borough — in England and it should not be beyond the will of the boroughs to make provision for gipsy sites. Many authorities which are very hard pressed —I include my own in Lambeth—have honoured their responsibilities and some have neglected them. But there is no longer any excuse for dereliction of duty because gipsies are not popular. The fact that sites are not provided does not make the problem any easier. It simply shifts it somewhere else and in an unplanned way. The seasonal pattern of settlement by travellers needs to be looked at. My observation in Lambeth is that they tend to come into the city in winter and move out during the summer. There may be seasonal variations in other parts of England. It would be worth while looking at whether seasonal camp sites for travellers might meet part of the problem. I hope the Government will get the recalcitrant local authorities to do their duty, particularly since the Government are paying 100 per cent. of the cost.

I make no apology for mentioning a constituency point about the urban programme. I represent a borough which is in an inner-city partnership. Last year we had a net benefit, because the Government pay 75 per cent. of the cost of the inner city partnership, of about £10 million. That seems generous, but of that £10 million half went to voluntary organisations. My borough disperses a good deal of money among voluntary organisations. Only half of it went to what might be called statutory schemes. The net benefit to Lambeth council, which is in an inner city partnership, was £5 million.

Last year, penalties imposed on Lambeth council amounted to £15 million. For every pound that was being put in the collection plate, £3 was being stolen from the vestry. This borough is one of the third most deprived in the country and it is now engaged in a battle with the district auditor as to whether its conduct of affairs in Lambeth has been in order. I hope the Minister will have some regard, even at this late stage, to the financial responsibilities of boroughs such as Lambeth.

The urban programme imposes a very heavy burden as programmes become time expired and need to be picked up by the local authority. I hope the Minister's department will recognise the great burdens that are placed on these authorities and the fact that they are being fined. Last year my borough was fined £3 for every pound net which went into its coffers. If one sets this against the aid which one sees in the Estimates going to the London Docklands development corporation—£50 million with 20 per cent.

going on administration expenses—it does not appear that the same discipline applies there. The same kind of discipline does not apply in Islington as in Lambeth. I am sure that the results of expenditure by the local authority within the inner city partnership in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) are that houses are selling at £250,000. The contrast between the expenditure which the docklands corporation is liable to undertake and the penalties imposed on almost every single partnership authority shows that there is no justice as between the two.

Mobility means being able to move from one part of the country to another, which is a matter close to the hearts of many local authority tenants. When people talk about the right to buy and own their own homes, they are talking not merely about ownership itself but about the incidence of ownership, the freedom to be able to move from one part of the country to another in order to be near a relative or to obtain a job or simply because they choose to move. I have every sympathy with them, but the Estimates show that there is very little consistency in the help offered.

Last year there was a one in 450 chance of a local authority tenant moving under the two mobility schemes mentioned in the Select Committee report. The average Government contribution per move was £28·92 for local authority tenants. If one were a housing association tenant and that housing association was not a charity, the contribution to mobility costs would be nil. If, on the other hand, one was a tenant of a charitable housing association and was able to claim the discount and buy a house in another part of the country, the maximum contribution to the tenant of the charitable housing association would be £24,000, 60 per cent. of the maximum cost of £40,000. There can be no justification for such wide inconsistencies as between one group of occupants and another. Bearing in mind that people attach great importance to being able to move from one part of the country to another, I hope that the Government will see what can be done to improve the chances of transferability.

We have an enforced mobility time bomb ticking away when, towards the end of July, many thousands of young people in London in receipt of help with bed and breakfast from the Department of Health and Social Security will be forced out of accommodation because the Government are intent on saving money by abolishing this benefit.

I turn to class VII Vote 1 and I take as my text part of paragraph 14 of the Select Committee report which says:

"It seems certain that there is a very large backlog of housing maintenance at the present day and, against that background, it seems to us imperative that the available resources are appropriately distributed between the private and public sectors. No one knows at present if that is being done."

We do know something about what is being done. First of all, we know that the Estimates before the House are wholly inadequate to preserve, let alone improve, the housing stock in both the public and private sectors. The Department of the Environment has engaged on a policy of economic lunacy. Those are not my words but the words of many Government Members used in debates on capital expenditure. That Department and its Secretary of State has become a housing Nero fiddling while Britain crumbles.

I use the word "fiddling" because that is exactly what it has done with capital receipts. The Government introduced a right to buy. They argued that the money could be reinvested in housing, that money gathered in was the local authority's own funds. Now we find that £6,000 million at least stored in the coffers of local authorities cannot be spent in order that the Chancellor may balance his books. That money belongs to the local authorities, and was provided from private funds. I can give some examples of the idiocy of the Government's policy.

A couple of weeks ago, with my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), I went to Sefton, which is a Conservative local authority which takes its housing responsibilities seriously. In parts of the borough, the local authority is selling houses to Barratt and Wimpey to try to get some help from the private sector, as the Government have urged, to improve some of its housing stock. It is not always the older housing stock that needs improving most—sometimes the newer housing stock needs it more.

When the work is done by one of these firms, that is private expenditure and the Government are in favour of it. When the local authority sells some of its property or sites, the money has come from building firms, banks, insurance companies and institutions and is therefore private. However, the moment that it passes into the hands of the council, it becomes subject to a surcharge of 80 per cent., so that 80 per cent. of it cannot be spent. That is economic lunacy.

I can give another example, this time of a Labour authority that I visited recently, Gateshead. It is an inner-city partnership authority, recognised for its needs in housing and for its area's dereliction and unemployment. It receives no housing subsidy from the Government but it does receive money for environmental improvement. The people of Gateshead cannot understand why the Government are giving them money, through a vote for environmental improvements such as putting up trees and putting in colour paving, projects of which I am in favour, while, because of the restriction of the housing investment programme, they cannot spend money on properties. The council can put down pink paving stones but it cannot put roofs on houses.

The Government have an economic rain dance, but the only economic effect is that the rain is coming through peoples' roofs. Gateshead authority has £30 million tied up in capital receipts. What on earth can be the justification for urging an authority to engage in environmental improvements and then preventing it from spending its money on problems such as those at the Newcastle flats where there is the particularly difficult and expensive job of providing bathrooms and internal WCs?

I can give yet another example, this time the Tory-controlled Rushmoor council. It is one of the councils that opposed the abolition of the GLC because it has such a large stock of ex-GLC homes that are in need of major renovation. I have the minutes of a council meeting. There is now a new classification of the housing investment bid. One can make a bid for what one thinks one needs, and one can make a second bid for what one thinks one can get. One is called the proposed programme and the other is called the constrained programme.

I shall take Rushmoor's proposed programme because it seems a fair estimate of what needs to be spent on the renovation, construction and insulation of dwellings. The programme for 1986-87 would cost £12 million. The minutes say:

"The constrained programme would not allow the Council to carry out its policy of carrying out the Prospect Estate remedial work to 100 units per year for 1986/87".

[Mr. John Fraser]

It says that there is no way that it can discharge its responsibility under the present constrained programme arrangements. However, there is a way that it can do so, because it has £12 million locked up in capital receipts. There is a Tory local authority that, given the chance, would be able to spend money and undertake its responsibilities but is prevented from doing so. Therefore, my comment that the Government are fiddling while the housing stock crumbles is justified.

The Select Committee said that it was not sure of the scale of the problem in the private sector. However, I have a fair idea. I now know that there are 250,000 private owner-occupiers who are mostly poor and with very few capital resources, and who were left in the lurch once the Government ended the pre-election boom in improvement grants. We know their needs. We do not have the English figures, but we know from the Welsh figures that most of the people who pick up repair and improvement grants have little money in the bank and no income. That boom has come to an end. There is little opportunity of those people being able to get improvement grants even under the Government's new means-tested and mean scheme, which has had a pretty widespread thumbs down as to its possible success.

I am sure that every hon. Member has people coming to his advice bureau every week, and some of the circumstances are tragic. Last week, a retired man came to see me. Simply because he is an owner-occupier, he is not entitled to supplementary benefit. He gets only his retirement pension. He has suffered a stroke, and water is pouring through his owner-occupied house. That case is not untypical and there is no way in which we can help that man and many like him, given the present constrained state of the housing investment programme. That is not just bad policy but immoral, particularly in the case of those who were led to believe that they would get grants from Government.

The Government's policy is not merely a fiddle but is incompetent, as the Controller of Audit put it in his speech at the Institute of Housing conference. He put "a price on the waste and inefficiency resulting from present controls on local government capital spending. The figure is a staggering £50 billion . . . If I were asked to design a system that would produce more waste and inefficiency to control capital expenditure, it is not immediately certain what additional complications I would build in".

The system is not just dishonest, it is inefficient. The Government sometimes say that they do not know how much money there is in capital receipts. I have an answer to a parliamentary question yesterday. I asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the total of capital receipts from the sale of council houses in the last financial year was, and I was told £1·3 billion.

Last year, local authorities were not allowed to spend that £1·3 billion, which was taken from private sources. They were allowed to spend 40 per cent. of it and £600 million of it was sequestrated — sequestration has become not merely a function of, but an obsession with, the Government. If the same rate of capital receipts continues in 1985-86, local authorities will be denied £1 billion in capital receipts, from the payment of mortgages and the sale of council houses, which they could spend on improvement and repair. That is equivalent to 100,000 jobs for a year being thrown away by local authorities not being able to spend their own money. That figure was arrived at without trying to use the additional figures of the extra jobs that would be created as a result of the multiplier effect.

It is illogical, a breach of faith, and a denial of the use by local authorities of their own funds, to use capital expenditure in this way and at the same time to cut the allocation of money from central Government and the housing investment programme. The Minister gave the House some figures yesterday. I have calculations of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. In real terms, we are getting about 30 per cent. of the capital expenditure of the local authority housing programme that we were getting in 1979-80. For the first time in over a century, we have a Government who disown their general housing obligations.

I found some election material for battles between Disraeli and Gladstone. At one election in the 1870s both campaigned about sanitary housing. They recognised that they had an obligation to attend to general housing needs. Since then, almost all Governments have recognised that responsibility. They have not always discharged that obligation but they recognised it. Harold Macmillan recognised it; Wheatley and Nye Bevan recognised it. Last year the Government pretended that they recognised that obligation when they said in a Public Expenditure White Paper that they had three policy objectives:

"to increase the level of home ownership; to encourage the repair and improvement of existing stock; and to concentrate public resources within the housing programme on capital provision for those in greatest housing need."

This year the Government's main aim in housing policy is to increase home ownership so that more families can achieve their ambition of owning their own home. Good luck to them, but nothing is being done about other housing responsibilities.

Cuts in improvement grants and in the general funds available for capital spending have been made and the Government say that they intend to carry out a survey of local authority needs. We do not need a survey because plenty of material has already been provided by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. I have three well documented reports containing the figures. Paragraph 7.10 of the document "Defects in Housing: Part I: 'Non-traditional' dwellings of the 1940s and 1950s" published in July 1983 states:

"We estimate that the average cost of works to non-traditional dwellings, for both repair, or in severe cases demolition and replacement, will be £10,000 per unit. This results in a likely total cost £5,000 million."

A second report was produced in March 1984 called "Industrialised and system built dwellings of the 1960s and 1970s" which said in paragraph 7.15:

"The cost of dealing with the defects problem is obviously difficult to quantify. Nevertheless, judging from the regularity of which certain items appear for different types and systems, it seems that the average unit cost will be around £5,000 . . . the total cost could therefore be up to £5,000 million."

In March 1985 the AMA produced another report. It produces them every year so the Government do not have to digest too much at a time. That report was about the repair and modernisation of traditional-built dwellings. In that, the association says that the total cost for England —not for Great Britain—is £6,000 million.

The figures may seem large but they illustrate how people have to live with damp, water dripping through the roof, far too expensive heating systems and cockroaches breeding. When the Government impose a moratorium on spending they cannot freeze the condition of the housing stock. A house is not like a crashed car that one can put in the garage until one has enough money to repair it. Houses rot, the cockroaches breed and the condition of the properties becomes worse. They become more damp. Not only the houses but the society which occupies them disintegrates.

The Select Committee says that no one seems to know what is being done. It is nearer the truth to say that everyone knows that almost nothing is being done to the publicly owned housing fabric.

It is not that the Government are ignorant of the problem. Ministers visit housing estates and talk to local authority representatives. As the Minister for Housing and Construction is so fond of saying, the Opposition do not have a monopoly of compassion. We do not say that the Government do not care, but that they have the means to tackle the problem. The greatest indictment of them is that while having the ability to solve the problem they refuse to budge because of their monetary obsession.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I begin by adding to the visible embarrassment felt by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) by complimenting him on his report and excellent speech. The Government welcome the debate which he initiated because it gives us the opportunity to review in detail my Department's expenditure. As the details of administration become more complex, it becomes harder for hon. Members and Ministers to scrutinise in depth all the figures in the Estimates. It is of enormous value when a Select Committee with its special knowledge and expert advice takes on the task of preliminary scrutiny and examination. As my hon. Friend said, the work is not sensational, but it is important because the sums involved are substantial and are spent in sensitive areas.

I propose to concentrate on the Select Committee's recommendations. I am aware that I might not reply to all the points. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), for example, fired a metaphorical 12-bore shotgun at my Department from a considerable range and the scatter was broad. I shall have to answer many of his questions by letter. Some of the questions, although aimed at my Department, hit other Departments and it is for them to reply. I shall say a word later about the macro economic issues which he raised in a reflective passage of his speech.

I shall deal briefly with what the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said in his closing remarks. Last year a record sum of £1 billion was spent on renovating public sector housing stock in addition to the £1 billion from the revenue account which was spent on repair and maintenance. The hon. Gentleman did not mention that. The main difference between the two parties is that the Opposition see a predominantly public sector solution to the acknowledged difficulties, whereas Conservatives are anxious to harness private sector resources. We think that by that means we can make faster progress in tackling the problems.

Ministers and others have to tread carefully on the subject of dogs. I share the Select Committee's anxiety that a solution should be found quickly to the current absurdity of dog licensing. As the Committee and my hon. Friend said, we have consulted widely about the alternatives to the present system. The response has been wide and varied. Some argue that it would be best to abolish the dog licence. Many others are worried about the nuisance caused by dogs and believe that a higher licence fee would encourage more responsible dog ownership and finance measures to deal with the problems caused by the irresponsible.

Some who favour the retention of the licence fee want the fee to be determined nationally—the view expressed by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). Others agree with the view in the consultation paper that there should be some local discretion.

The Government have been considering the response to the consultation paper. We shall announce our conclusions as soon as possible. We shall take on board comments made in today's debate. I know that hon. Members think that we are taking too long to make a decision, but the issue is both complex and emotive. It is easier to criticise the present arrangements than to establish a new system. The Select Committee did not come down in favour of any of the options under consideration.

We are anxious to find a sensible and lasting solution, but I emphasise that any option, apart from the straightforward increase in the fee, needs primary legislation before it can be implemented. We are aware of the Select Committee's anxiety that expenditure which they rightfully describe as wasteful should end.

A question has been tabled to the Home Secretary about details of a pilot scheme testing new byelaws to reduce the nuisance of dog fouling. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is considering a pilot project to test the effectiveness of byelaws requiring people to clear up excrement deposited by their dogs in certain public places. Appropriately, the experiment will begin in the London borough of Barking.

I leave dogs for animals in general, the London zoo and the question of grants to voluntary bodies. My Department agrees with the view of the Committee that it is bad practice that payments should be undertaken without specific statutory authority, except when a sudden need arises and in respect of which legislation will shortly be introduced or when the requirement is short-lived.

For the Zoological Society of London, the Government fully accept that statutory cover should be provided for the short and long-term financial assistance which it has recently been agreed, will be offered to the society. An early opportunity will be taken to introduce legislation seeking parliamentary approval to authorise this, but the House will be aware of the pressures on time, particularly those of us who have been up late for two nights on the Finance Bill. Although I hope that some progress will have been possible by the time that the Select Committee considers the Estimates for 1986-87, I can give no guarantee of that.

As for the Department's grant-giving to voluntary bodies, the Committee recognises that the range of departmental responsibilities to which grants relate poses a difficulty in drafting suitable legislation, but we are now confident that most, if not all, of the Department of the Environment grant-giving could be covered by a widely drawn power and, again, a legislative opportunity is awaited.

With regard to payments to international bodies, my Department is discussing with the Treasury what action is needed to give cover to this expenditure and how it might best be obtained. I note the warning of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green about what might happen if the position continues to be unresolved.

[Sir George Young]

A number of issues were raised about housing. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) asked me to give figures for expenditure on the scheme for home ownership for tenants of charitable housing associations. The estimate of the cost in 1984-85, the first year of the operation of the scheme, was £10 million and the outturn was £3·45 million. When we announced the corporation's ADP on 21 January, the Minister for Housing and Construction gave the estimate of the likely cost in 1985-86 as £17 million. The scheme is now going well and we are currently considering whether any more resources can be carried forward from last year's underspend. We have given no figure yet for last year.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) asked when a decision would be made on allocations in respect of the Housing Defects Act. Additional allocations to authorities which have particular difficulties in meeting their obligations will be made shortly under the Act.

I was asked a number of questions about home improvement grants. The Committee attaches considerable importance to ensuring that resources for the improvement and repair of the nation's housing stock should be appropriately distributed between the public and private sectors. We accept that it is important for available resources to be directed where they are most needed. This involves making some decision about distribution between the two sectors.

It is up to local authorities to divide the resources that are available to them and, with their statutory responsibility for housing in their areas and the knowledge of local circumstances, I believe that they are best placed to decide on local needs and priorities. That is why we allocate the capital resources as a single block to each authority, which they can then allocate as they think fit. In allocating resources between authorities, we consider, among other things, the condition of the housing stock in the public and private sectors.

We already have a good deal of information from the English house condition survey, which is scheduled to be repeated in 1986, and I can confirm that information will be available on a comparable basis to the proceeding survey. As the hon. Member for Norwood said, we are in the process of supplementing—by means of a special inquiry into the repair and improvement needs of the housing stock in local authority ownership — our information on this subject. We expect the first results from that inquiry to be available at the end of the month.

We shall then have a more up-to-date view of the national need for improvement and repair in the two sectors. However, while that may inform our decision on the allocation of resources between authorities, the individual authorities will continue to be best placed to decide on distribution at a local level.

In our allocation procedures, we shall take into account the different roles of local authorities in the two sectors. For their housing, authorities have the same responsibility as any landlord to make sure that the property is kept in good repair and that necessary improvements are carried out.

In the private sector, the primary responsibility rests with owners. They clearly recognise that, as the great majority of the more than £9 billion a year spent on home improvements is already financed largely by savings or by borrowing from the financial institutions. An important effect of the 1982 Budget initiative was that householders were made even more aware of the benefits of improving and repairing their homes and securing the value of their property.

The private sector organisations have also realised that there is much that they can do to encourage and assist owners to carry out repair work. For example, the National Home Improvement Council has set up neighbourhood revitalisation services in several areas, and the Anchor Housing Trust's "Staying Put" schemes are especially geared to helping elderly people to maintain and retain their homes. We want to encourage the private sector to help itself in that sort of way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr Chapman) reminded the House of the growth in expenditure on home improvement grants — up from £200 million in 1981-82 to £900 million in 1983-84 and about £730 million in 1984-85. More than 250,000 grants were paid in 1983-84 and about 200,000 last year. There has been a shift in priorities, both for local authorities and individual home owners, who are giving greater priority to maintaining the housing stock.

I am glad that the Committee recognises that it is not easy for local authorities concerned to find suitable gipsy sites. As the Committee rightly says, proposals to establish a site arouse considerable opposition from local residents. There has been a gradual increase in site provision since the grant aid was introduced in 1979-80, and a number of studies have been carried out within the Department to consider whether any other steps may be taken to speed site provision.

These have enabled us to produce booklets on the management of gipsy sites and on the question of defining a gipsy. Copies have been made available to the House when published. We are also preparing a leaflet about private sites. However, we shall certainly take another look at the problem on the lines that the Committee recommends

It has been said that authorities have shirked their duty in that respect. There is a remedy in the courts and some local authorities have been taken to court by representatives of gipsies who believe that the Act should be upheld. The duty to provide sites is mandatory, not discretionary. The record shows that we are prepared to take account of unfair trading on conscientious authorities in the discussions that we have with individual authorities about the designation of their areas.

The Committee considered the difficulties people living in rented accommodation have in moving from one part of the country to another. The Government provide assistance to those who need to move, through the national mobilty and tenants exchange schemes. These two schemes are shortly to be brought together, providing opportunities for increased rationalisation and effectiveness.

Under the national mobility scheme, local authorities make available 1 per cent. of their annual lettings for people moving into the area from outside the county, plus one more letting for each of their nominees who is housed elsewhere. The Select Committee commented that the 1 per cent. of lettings available was unduly low and thought that consideration should be given to raising the figure to 2 per cent. or more as a contribution to helping those moving for employment.

I share the Committee's concern about the difficulties that people have in obtaining housing when they move for work. Indeed, last year I asked the national mobility steering committee to consider increasing the 1 per cent. proportion, but the local authority associations opposed the proposal, and it was rejected. The steering committee agreed, however, to reconsider the proposal in a year's time, and I hope that it will take note of the Select Committee's views.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) asked what our proposals were. I believe that it would make sense for the national mobility office to assume responsibility both for the Greater London mobility scheme and for the seaside and country homes scheme. As he will be aware, a committee is looking into that. When that committee has reported and a decision has been taken, we shall be better placed to take decisions about financial responsibility for the scheme.

My Department is informally exploring further ways of encouraging local authorities to meet the present 1 per cent. target, but any move to make the scheme statutory would be stongly resisted by the local authorities, and I fear that it would disrupt the present smooth running of the scheme, which operates by consensus and co-operation.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: On the subject of mobility, it is all very well for the Minister to point out the difficulties involved in moving to a statutory scheme, but so long as large numbers of authorities, particularly in areas such as Scotland, fail to participate, it cannot help but lack effectiveness. Has he any proposals to apply a little more persuasion on those authorities?

Sir George Young: I know that the Chairman of the Committee this year is devoting considerable time persuading the relatively small numbers of local authorities which have not joined to join. We are talking of a handful in England and relatively few in Scotland. We hope to make progress by persuasion and consent.

A number of comments have been made about the urban programme and about the desirability of targeting the programme. The Government's intention is to concentrate the help provided by the traditional urban programme on the areas with the greatest need. Included will be some areas that are not designated under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978, but the programme should not be seen as a long shot for grant aid by every undesignated district. I accept that as we concentrate resources more effectively we should avoid abortive work by discouraging from bidding areas that are unlikely to be successful. Part of the problem is that the programme operates through a circular which is sent to all authorities. This becomes a less appropriate way in which to operate as the number of authorities receiving approval falls. It may be that we should offer invitations explicitly to priority areas rather than issuing a circular to every authority. We shall be announcing proposals for consultation with local authorities in the last couple of weeks.

The designation of Newham has been referred to on several occasions. The previous Labour Government did not designate it, so the crime, if there is one, has been committed equally by both the Labour Government and the present Government. Newham has within its boundaries the London Docklands development corporation, which is injecting substantial sums of public money into the infrastructure. That is an advantage that other London boroughs do not have.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister knows that only 6 per cent. of Newham's population live in the docklands area. There is a distortion of the local economy that is of no great assistance to the remaining 94 per cent. of the population, which badly needs the resources that partnership status would provide.

Sir George Young: The LDDC is providing jobs, which I hope are of interest to the hon. Gentleman's constituents. It is providing housing as well. About 40 per cent. of the houses that the corporation builds go to those who live in the area. The fact that very few live in the LDDC area at present is irrelevant. Very few people live there because the area comprises mostly docks. The one thing that I can say about the speech of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West is that for once he resisted the temptation to have a dig at the LDDC. I regard the fact that he did not mention it this evening as a cause for hope.

The Select Committee commented on the international garden festival. It rightly observes in its report that the financial outturn did not meet expectations. I accept that conclusion and I can assure the House that we have already begun our own assessment of the project. When our inquiries are complete, we shall report the findings to the Committee. It is important that the lessons are properly documented to provide guidance for similar future projects.

I think that everyone will agree that the festival brought new life and newfound confidence to Merseyside. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet for his remarks about the festival. The development corporation is worthy of the highest praise for the way in which it mounted the project. When I visited the festival last summer I found it difficult to believe that such a high quality environment had been created in such a short time from dereliction. I shall report to the Select Committee in due course on the lessons to be learned.

What did we get for the money which was expended on the festival? Liverpool now has an area of landscaped parkland of which it can be truly proud. It has a festival hall that can be converted to leisure and sports use as well as a riverside walkway. There are landscaped sites that are ready for high quality residential and industrial development. A number of jobs were created during the two and a half years of construction. Expenditure by visitors to the festival amounted to about £9 million, which benefited local hotels and guest houses.

Now that the festival has ended, I hope that the corporation will succeed in persuading the private sector to take on and develop the site. Whatever happens, Merseyside will have had the benefit of hosting a unique event and of gaining the many assets and benefits which came from it.

The administration costs of the London Docklands Development Corporation have been referred to during the debate. This issue must be placed in the context of the task that is faced by the corporation. Anyone who has visited the docklands recently, will, I am sure, have been impressed by the progress that has been made, especially on the Isle of Dogs. The area has been transformed. Work on the structures for the railway is everywhere evident.

The first phase of the distinctive Heron Quays office development has been completed. Construction of the Daily Telegraph's new printing works is well advanced and many other formerly derelict sites are now alive with construction work. I congratulate Christopher Benson and his team on the corporation's excellent record.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: No. I must make progress in fairness to those who wish to participate in the next debate.

At the same time, I share the Committee's view that we must keep a close watch on the LDDC's administration costs. The corporation, in conjunction with my Department, has started work on a review of its administration costs. The work started before the Committee's report was published.

We must take into account the fact that the LDDC must have regard for about 40,000 local people, whereas very few people live in the Merseyside docklands area. The LDDC has provided a marketing effort and the business support and advice necessary to attract more than £820 million in private investment to the docklands, whereas the MDC is only just beginning to gear up its activity. A substantial part of the corporation's broad definition of administrative costs goes to areas which other bodies examined by the Select Committee do not include as administration. This covers business development and support services, site marketing, community sport and estate management.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) addressed himself to the Property Services Agency and fraud and corruption. I assured the House last year that Ministers were determined to enforce the highest possible standards, and that remains true. The PSA has given top priority to implementing the Wardell-Touche Ross recommendations and those on other maintenance matters that have been raised by the National Audit Office in reporting to the PAC. The PAC took evidence earlier this year on progress and detailed in the evidence, which has been published, is the action that we have already taken.

As for the maintenance of the Government's estate, I share the Committee's concern about the backlog and the need to ensure that the funds that are available are used as economically and effectively as possible.

I accept both of the recommendations which the Committee has made on increased delegation and standards. We must ensure that common standards are applied throughout the area for which the PSA retains responsibility for maintenance. We have introduced a uniform classification of maintenance priorities and have started a programme of district management reviews, which will consider all the activities of the district works office. These measures will ensure that consistent standards are being applied.

I accept in principle the recommendation that we should increase the amount of delegation to Departments, though the way and extent to which this will be done needs to be considered carefully. In the current review of our relationships with other Departments we are trying to find a clearer definition of roles. The starting point is that the PSA has a clear task to fulfil as central manager of the civil estate. That means retaining responsibility for the structural maintenance of the properties on the estate. These are valuable public assets, and the PSA has the staff with the necessary technical expertise to know what needs to be done and how to specify and control the contracts so as to secure the best value for money.

We recognise that there is a good deal of sense in not merely making local managers and Departments aware of costs, as the property repayments system does, but giving them an appropriate share in the decisions that have to be taken between conflicting priorities. We hope that some of the experiments that have started on internal decoration will show that it is sensible to delegate this task to Departments where they do not affect the structure of the property or require technical expertise. Whether increased delegation will of itself produce better maintenance standards is another matter, because Departments are subject to the same constraints as the PSA. However, it will make for a more logical division of labour.

We shall pursue the issue of purchase of freeholds with the Treasury in the light of what the Committee has said.

The Committee dealt with the property repayments system at some length. As the report states, the system has been operating for two years. It is, however, such a major change in the way that Government accommodation is handled that it is still a comparatively new system and subject to review and development. It has been helpful to have the Committee's ideas during the formative stage of the process. It involves substantial operating costs, but the Government expect these to be more than offset by extra value for money.

The first area to which we should look for results is in the figures for the areas occupied. These have been reducing in recent years as staff numbers have been cut. The PSA has been seeking to rationalise the estate to reduce holdings to a minimum. However, some broad issues are raised about the role of the PSA by the Committee and it is not quite clear whether introducing commercial accounts would be in the interests of the PSA as it has been set up. We accept the Committee's recommendation that this matter should be considered and that the Treasury should be involved, but the Committee should not expect a quick solution to what I fear may be a rather difficult set of problems.

I shall deal by correspondence with the other issues that have been raised. I thank right hon. and hon. Members for their comments on my Department's expenditure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The Questions necessary to dispose of the first group of motions stand over to half-past eleven or at the conclusion of the debate on the final Estimate, whichever is the earlier, under the Order of the House of 4 July.

Health and Personal Social Services

Class XI, Vote 1

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum not exceeding £5,168,144,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Security on the provision of services under the national health service in England, on other health services including a grant in aid and on certain other services including research and services for the disabled. — [Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

7.20 pm

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): I am glad to have the opportunity to debate the report of the Social Services Committee on the care of the mentally ill and mentally handicapped, as, I am sure, are other members of the Select Committee. I am disappointed that, although the report was presented four and half months ago, we have not yet had a ministerial response. I hope that that gap will be filled. The Committee was well served by its expert advisers. I should like to thank David Plank, John Wing and Joy Young for all their work, help, advice and enthusiasm. The Committee is most grateful to them.

The Select Committee is now engaged on the social security reviews. We do not yet know about the effects of the reviews on the mentally disabled. Paragraph 147 of the report states that the analysis should show

"the benefit entitlements of mentally handicapped and mentally ill people."

I hope that the Minister for Health will fill that gap.

The Committee paid tribute to the great care given by doctors, nurses and other doing a multiplicity of jobs in the huge hospitals, often in isolated positions, during the last century. We saw huge hospitals in the United States with 20,000 patients. It is possible to move ahead too quickly. It is easy to move patients to cheaper, less well-motivated and less well-staffed places. If community care is to work, there must be locally based facilities which are well staffed by redeploying thousands of skilled, partly skilled and unskilled staff, as well as money. Unless that happens, community care will fail. If it is to work, there must be locally based psychiatric care, workshops and a rejigging of the social security system and taxation to encourage people if they find work. The clear lesson to be learned from our American visit is that we cannot close down one set of facilities, however imperfect, until the alternatives are firmly established.

It is fairly easy to shift patients from a state hospital to a less well-motivated and well-staffed "community facility", whatever it is. Large mental institutions can then be closed, but that does not help the patients. As the committee's report states:

"Any fool can close a hospital but it depends how you do it."

That statement has been widely reported in the press.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): In case the hon. Lady gives a misleading impression, will she give one example of where we have closed a large mental hospital without providing alternative facilities? I think the hon. Lady will agree that there is no such example in this country, although there may be examples in the United States or Italy, to which the Committee travelled.

Mrs. Short: If the Minister has the patience to bear with me, I hope to give some examples later.

Our present provision for mentally ill and mentally handicapped patients is underfunded and understaffed. If we are to transfer patients to the community, local authority expenditure will have to increase. That is the point that we are trying to put forward in this debate. Expenditure on housing, education and transport must increase. Unless we do so, an even greater burden will be imposed on the voluntary services. The only money that many patients will have will be their social security entitlements.

We must understand that many mentally ill and mentally handicapped people are already being cared for in the community in their own homes, or, if not, they are being cared for in group homes, hostels and lodgings. Better facilities will be needed for them. The Committee heard of many parents who were coping with their mentally handicapped children. These parents criticised the present inadequate provision. The careing professions made known their great concern during every visit that the Committee made.

There are, of course, day centres, group homes and sheltered workshops run by immensely dedicated people, but there is also great concern. We must bear in mind that mental illness hospitals scheduled for closure some years ago still have patients in them, some of whom are very old and frail. Some of those hospitals contain 1,000 or more patients. There is a danger that the Government are putting pressure on hospital authorities to close mental illness hospitals within certain time limits. This makes it difficult for psychologists, nurses and community mental health nurses to think about what should be provided for their patients.

The Committee's report states that the community psychiatric nurse is a key part of the new mental illness service. The director of the Health Advisory Service calls the CPN "probably the most important single professional in the process of moving care of mental illness into the community".

I am glad that there are now more CPNs in primary health care teams. During the Committee's visit to Blackburn and Tiverton we heard of general practitioners' increased confidence in referring patients to CPNs and of the confidence of CPNs able to work relatively independently. That is a very good development.

The Royal College of Psychiatrists favours that, but is anxious that it should be achieved by expanding the service rather than by redeploying those nurses who are already caring for more disabled psychiatric patients in the community. In 1977, the Trethowan report on the role of clinical psychologists recommended the employment of a minimum of 1,100. There are now 1,300, but they are unevenly spread throughout the community. There are half as many proportionately in Trent, Oxford and Wessex as in the north-western region. Those people should be training the therapists, nurses, care officers and assistants. Indeed, they should be training the relatives, giving them help and guidance when careing for their relations in their homes. In some areas the clinical psychologists are doing that, as Committee members saw on some of their vistis. I hope that the Committee will review the Trethowan report and encourage the leadership and potential of clinical psychologists.

The Committee has drawn attention to the fact that general practitioners are not always willing or able to care for mentally disabled patients. The Royal College of General Practitioners agreed that general practitioner training was inadequate for the job which the doctors were expected to do in caring for mentally disabled people in the community. I understand that the Royal College of Psychiatrists would be happy to help with general practitioner training. If the Minister for Health is willing to provide encouragement, this link between the two branches of the profession could be developed, and that would be helpful.

The president of the Royal College of Psychiatrists told the Committee:

"during the period since the 1950s, there has been a very radical change in the way in which psychiatrists have come outside the mental hospitals and have become more heavily involved with the community in a variety of ways"— notably with the concept of treatment and rehabilitation close to the patient's own home.

Not enough time is being given to the psychiatrists to plan acceptable alternatives. Public attitudes in the community must be considered. We are saying that the Minister for Health cannot turn people out of hospital before adequate community services have been provided for them. On discharge too many patients rely on seedy bed-and-breakfast lodgings, doss houses, park benches or even prison. The Select Committee is about to start an investigation into prison medical services, and I suppose that we shall come up against this problem again during that inquiry. Many private homes are springing up. There is no proper inspection, many charge large fees and no follow-up is provided by hospitals or social services. That is a serious gap in the present system of transfer from hospital care into the community.

It is possible to provide good care in ordinary domestic surroundings with sufficient resources and one-to-one staffing as the Committee saw in Nebraska as well as in Cardiff and elsewhere in the United Kingdom. The best form of accommodation is ordinary housing with staff with the necessary expertise providing for small groups of mentally ill people in the community. If the mentally ill are to be housed in the community, there must be a change of heart by their neighbours. We learned how to tackle that problem in Cardiff. It is important to talk to the neighbours about the project before the patients arrive.

Sheltered village-type communities can also provide an excellent environment for certain mentally ill patients. We visited a splendid Rudolf Steiner community overlooking the sea near Belfast where 60 mentally handicapped children and 30 mentally handicapped adults are cared for in a self-supporting community. They performed various interesting activities and ran a productive farm, breeding cattle and growing crops.

How will the Government carry out such a massive and diverse exercise in their present mood of cutting and skimping on the social services? The method of financing a successful programme of community care is crucial. The Minister for Health seemed confident when he told the House that the Government had sufficient financial mechanisms to encourage the discharge of long-stay patients and to establish matching services in the community, but the Select Committee for Social Services, health authorities, local authorities, voluntary organisations, parents and clients do not share the Minister's optimism.

Regional strategic plans for the next 10 years are now appearing. Many of the regional plans for mental illness and mental handicap are sound. They are full of the right sentiments. The real action, however, takes place in the districts. There are many vague proposals for National Health Service community mental handicap units and mental health centres, but there is little evidence that the districts have any clear notion of how the new long-stay chronically mentally ill will be cared for. Some patients will remain in the big old mental institutions which look as though they are to be closed, but which will close only in the sense that the Italians close their hospitals by changing their names.

Those Victorian hospitals will lose many of their staff, but they will retain a core of patients. Mapperley hospital in the Minister's area has 350 beds and is supposed to close by 1991. There will be a large 150-plus bed district psychiatric centre on that site. Middlewood hospital in Sheffield has 775 beds and is to close, but a new 120-bed unit is proposed on the edge of the existing site. The fear is that those patients will be conveniently forgotten. People will think that St. John's, Mapperley, Middlewood and Powick have been closed and attention will be concentrated on the more interesting community services.

The Select Committee recommended that at least the same proportion of resources should continue to be devoted to the most severely mentally disabled in the future. It also discussed the new long-stay provisions—the asylum function—in hostels or refuges rather than in new units built in the grounds of the old hospitals. It is essential that we do not neglect the chronically mentally disturbed.

Paragraphs 161 to 167 of the Select Committee report give the numbers of mentally disabled people in prisons or who are homeless or living in shelters. The Committee recommended a departmental inquiry into the care of homeless mentally ill people. Perhaps the Minister will tell us whether that is to take place. Over the past few months we have been monitoring the Government's policy on resettlement units and we intend to examine Ministers on that in the autumn, but perhaps the Minister will tell us today what consultation has taken place on replacing the local units and how far Camberwell will have been replaced when it closes its doors in September. In the autumn we shall also be examining the prison medical service. The British Medical Association has warned us that prisons could become the "sump" for caring for the mentally disabled.

With regard to mental handicap, it is disturbing to see the extent to which some of the old hospitals are being retained to an undesirable extent and that new institutions are being created. Barnsley is building a new mini-mental handicap hospital. Oxfordshire and Berkshire authorities are planning to build more than 12 large new units, generally of 25 beds, but including a 50-bed unit in Reading. The Government are not closing the large hospitals. The Select Committee went into this question in detail in paragraphs 55 to 58 of the report and concluded that new units on this scale were to be deprecated. Ministers must use the accountability review process to discover why authorities are still building so-called "Wessex units", which were a great advance in their day, when Wessex is moving rapidly towards the use of ordinary houses for six or seven people at a time.

Some plans show proposals for the transfer of patients from one institution to another. This is sometimes called relocation. In America it is called "transinstitutionalisation"—a marvellous word for Scrabble players, but a barely acceptable practice, as paragraphs 153 to 156 of the report observe. We warned that traffic of dependent people between institutions was in danger of developing. We believe that to be undesirable. We saw examples of this when we visited Powick outside Worcester. As it is European Music Year, I remind hon. Members that Powick was the hospital where Elgar had his first job as a music master. Powick was supposed to have closed, but we have been to see it and have seen the patients there. There are approximately 100 patients left at Powick. They will be dumped elsewhere to enable the authority to make millions of pounds from the sale of that beautiful site overlooking the Malvern hills for private development or whatever.

Trent is planning to move 100 Saxondale patients to the site of Ransom mental handicap hospital. Northampton is planning to move 100 St. Crispin's patients to Princess Marina mental handicap hospital and 45 patients from St. John's Aylesbury to Manor House mental handicap hospital. It would be possible on this basis to close all long-stay hospitals, but they are not really being closed —the patients are simply being juggled around.

The nub of the problem is resources. The Select Committee's first and broadest conclusion is that at present mental disability services are underfinanced and understaffed. It is impossible to achieve the level of community care that everyone wants without some increase in resources. The Select Committee is not just asking for more money. If there were no community care policies, we could not continue for much longer with the kind of hospital service that we have. The Victorian asylum type of hospital is now inadequate. The Select Committee saw some very grim conditions, as I have described to the House. The press is understandably more interested in exposing the shortcomings of community care —the lodging house problem. We should not forget the alternative. The Select Committee report states in paragraph 21:

"The relative neglect in mental illness and mental handicap hospitals has only been tolerable (if barely so) because of the promise of a major shift in the locus of care."

The particular problem to which I want to draw attention in the context of an Estimates debate is the difficulty of transferring resources from one area of public expenditure to another, from one ministerial Department to another. We spend over £2 billion on health and personal social services, a further considerable sum on social security payments for mentally disabled people, and there is further expenditure by education and housing departments. Money does not flow as easily between those structures as it does between patients.

The Committee expects to see an eventual reduction in NHS expenditure and an increase in local authority expenditure, as we describe in paragraph 22, flowing primarily from our recommendation that while the National Health Service should not be constrained in the short term from providing community residential services for mentally handicapped people, in the long term all social care—that is, non-clinical care—mental handicap services should be financed and administered by local authorities. That is already happening in some districts, but not in all. It is a question of the transfer of resources.

The Committee looked at the Government's care in the community initiatives, and they are very welcome. We look forward to their evaluation by the personal social services research unit in Kent, so long as that unit concentrates on what happens to patients and not just on the book-keeping exercise, because it is what happens to patients that is important. The Committee concluded that they did not at present offer a persuasive solution to the permanent transfer of resources. The very fact that the DHSS is funding them with bridging money means that they cannot easily be repeated. What is more, because they quite properly concentrate on getting specific people out of hospital, there is no certainty as to who will fund the services once those people no longer need them. Also, the services concentrate on getting people out of hospital rather than on the maintenance of the majority of mentally disabled people who are already in the community anyway. We must not overlook that.

The Committee made several recommendations in that connection and in paragraph 68 we recommend "that Ministers create means of bringing about the necessary permanent transfer of resources to local authorities so that by the end of the century they will be in a position to take over prime responsibility for non-medical services for mentally handicapped people."

That is a clear recommendation.

We also make several recommendations which are designed to improve joint planning between health and local authorities and to toughen up regional and departmental oversight. We think that the recently published strategic plans are rather thin on the nitty-gritty of joint planning. Perhaps the Minister will say what he intends to do about that.

We call for a central bridging fund to enable resources to be released to build up a new style of mental illness and mental handicap service before the hospitals are fully closed, with the resultant savings. In paragraphs 111 to 116 we explain why we think that is necessary, as do most experts. Much of the per capita cost of a patient is tied up in fixed costs and ancillary staff, so that the discharge of a few patients does not itself produce any savings, because the staff who are already there have to remain to look after the patients who are left behind.

Mrs. Major of the National Schizophrenia Fellowship, who gave us some very good evidence, put the matter well when she said:

"Patients should not be removed until the alternative facilities actually exist in the community. It seems to me that it is like asking a passenger to jump off an elderly ship into the stormy sea with the assurance that the lifeboat will be along in a few months' time."

By then, of course, there will not be any patients to pick up.

Some regions have apparently managed to close long-stay hospitals, or at least to run them down. We say in paragraph 115:

"the fact of discharge, of bed reduction does not reveal anything of the quality of community services provided. Some authorities have followed a path of either racing ahead and damning the consequences or of simply dismantling their existing services and rebuilding them in local wards still under NHS control."

Somewhere new buildings are to be put up to do precisely that.

Some regions do not have anything like sufficient funds for such reserves. We gave as an example south-west Thames and the huge Epsom cluster. The same is likely to be true of north-west Thames and the Hertfordshire hospitals. The Committee has just received a very useful and full response from west Lambeth health authority. That is a district authority which is a RAWP-losing district within a RAWP-losing region. Its budget is being severely cut over 10 years. It is obliged to race ahead with the closure of Tooting Bec. We refer to that in paragraph 218 of our report. The local authority is rate-capped, penalised and generally restricted.

The Committee visited Friern hospital in the Prime Minster's constituency. It serves districts which are also RAWP losers, and boroughs in north-east London which have no funds to spare. No doubt some authorities can manage more easily. The Committee concluded, in paragraph 116:

"There are excuses as well as reasons for the lack of action."

But for many some sort of centrally provided short-term funding is essential to bridge the gap. The Minister and the Government have to find some ways of getting over that problem.

Between 1979 and 1984 a financial gain of over £101 million has been made by the sale of hospital land. Much of that may well have been land attached to mental illness or mental handicap hospitals. What does the Minister intend to do with that money? What has happened to it so far? I know that the figure is correct, because the Minister gave it to me in reply to a parliamentary question.

I see from today's evening press that we have won over the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the view expressed from the Opposition Benches that defence expenditure should be reduced, and a figure of £500 million is being suggested. Perhaps the Minister will get his eye on some of that money.

The message from the Select Committee is that resources must be found if the Government's declared policy is to succeed. It cannot be done otherwise. I hope that the Minister will bear in mind the good advice that we give him.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): May I add my thanks and tribute to the Select Committee's advisers and say what a pleasure it was to serve as a member of the Committee, under the urbane leadership of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short). As I have experience of only one Select Committee, I have nothing with which to compare it, but if the experience of members of the Social Services Committee is anything to go by, I suspect that the Select Committee is a useful and helpful part of our procedures and our democracy in this Parliament.

The report of the Select Committee is unanimous. There was an intense effort to ensure that what we reported was supported by all members of the Committee. The membership of the Committee covers a wide spectrum not only of politics but of personalities. It ranges from the quiet, genteel members to the not so quiet and genteel. [HON. MEMBERS: "Which are you?"] I think that I join hands with the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton).

It would be discourteous to other hon. Members to concentrate on more than a few aspects of the subject in the time that is available, so I want to emphasise one or two of the points that appear to me to be significant in the various visits that we made and evidence that we took.

Throughout our work, I was interested to find that what one area told us was impossible was being done in other areas. On many occasions we were told that it was impossible to move certain patients out of an institution, but the next day one found that it was being done at some other place. There is a terrible danger that not only the patients in institutions but the staff become used to what they have and, without malevolence, cannot see beyond that. Those who are charged with the political responsibility for policy-making in the Health Service and the social services, as well as in the House, must grapple with the problem of what level of paternalism should be allowed.

The type of paternalism that seems to be beneficial is when experts say that they know what is best for their elderly mentally handicapped patients, and that is to show them what it is like outside the institution. Unless that is done, patients will be unable to decide what they want: they will always decide that they want what they already have. That sort of paternalism can be valuable. The worrying side of paternalism is when patients are guarded because, it is said, it is too frightening for them to leave the institution. Again, that is done not out of malevolence but from a desire to care for those who are fragile and vulnerable.

In our inquiries, the matter of philosophy of risk was very striking. I have come to realise more and more that the risk that we allow, not only to the patients, but to those whom they might harm, is a political decision. Too often, we shelter behind the experts charged with the care of those people. If something goes wrong, we turn our back and ask, "Why did the social services allow this to happen? Why did the health authority not do more?" We must realise that if we are to encourage the flow into the community of those who have disorders, are vulnerable mentally, or perhaps have behavioural problems which may influence others, there is a risk attached.

We must grapple with the problem of risk. I was impressed by the director of a mental health institute in America, who said that he could sedate the patients for 12 months of the year and remove all risk. However, he also said that we would lose the benefit to the community of many of the patients, who are splendid members of society for nine months of the year and have much to contribute, but who are disturbed for perhaps three months. He said that it was our choice and that we could decide.

At the lowest level it applies if we wish people to live in as normal conditions as possible. As the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) said earlier, the best option is an ordinary house in an ordinary street. But fire officers insist that if there is a group of people living communally, the fire regulations require that extras such as fire doors and fire escapes must be added to the house. The property ceases to be an ordinary house in an ordinary street. That is a vivid aspect of the problems of normality and risk. We must be shrewd and decide whether to put up with the risk and not shelter behind authorities when something goes wrong, because somewhere at some time something is sure to go wrong.

Although some would say that we were brave or perhaps foolhardy, we touched on the delicate matter of sexuality. We tend to shy away from the problem of the rights of those who cannot guard their emotions and vulnerability in the same way as others. We asked those with legal minds to consider carefully the responsibility of those who care for such people and to consider the rights regarding contraception and other matters relating to sexuality.

There is a danger in thinking that if only we get all the practical steps right, people will enter the community without problems. The longer I remain in politics, the more I become convinced that we cannot change people's hearts and minds simply by changing policies. The context in which we develop policies is just as important as the pragmatic decisions. Although we should discuss the practical points to which the hon. Lady drew attention and which the report details at great length and, I hope, powerfully, it is just as important for us to argue with our constituents and our communities about the need to accept people whose behaviour may seem to be abnormal and who may appear to pose an extra burden on the community. Their behaviour should be regarded within the very broad spectrum of behaviour and personality. Without that understanding or acceptance, policies are empty and might, in some respects, be provocative.

It is important to recognise that the stress may be greatest in our urban communities, where many such people are sent to live because of the tremendous care that can be offered by urban organisations. Those who are struggling to survive on old estates or with unemployment — or whatever social conditions impact greatly upon them—may believe, alas, that they could do without the extra burden of having people in the community to whom they must give more attention. It behoves us all to recognise that the context of the community is desperately important if the good policies outlined in the report are to succeed.

Although the hon. Lady rightly drew attention to the need for more resources, I would not wish the House to believe that that is the only solution. We do not always consider the links between the voluntary sector and the different aspects of the Health Service, social services and the social security system. The total resources that can be provided by all those organisations may mean much less to an individual than institutional care. We cannot say that one solution — perhaps that of social security income support—is better than drawing the services together. It would be unwise to believe that the report asks only for vastly increased resources. We need a host of other services, too.

I should emphasise to the Minister that the bridging facilities between institutional care and the community are expensive. We cannot make large savings by closing an institution and disposing of the buildings and land until it is entirely closed. There is a serious problem in providing a bridge between what we have now and what we want. I hope that the Minister will take on board the crucial point that each area may need funds to provide such bridging facilities.

An adviser to the Committee drew to its attention an interesting paradox in the financial resources committed to this area of care. Although we are anxious to close some institutions, because the concept of the asylum is now completely anachronistic, paradoxically, the people of 100 years ago committed more resources to those buildings, in real terms, than we are committing today. They were splendidly built; they would not have survived for so long if they were not. Many of them are situated in vast acres of beautiful land. We saw an institution in Surrey that was advanced for its time. It had separate buildings with wonderful facilities among them, and the resources committed to it were probably more in real terms than the resources about which we are talking today.

If we consider the cost of keeping an individual in an institution or caring for him in the community, the difference may not be as significant as we might have thought. Roughly, it costs about £11,000 per person a year in an institution, and £13,000 to £14,000 a year outside. Community care is dearer, but not much more so.

We should commend the organisations that have not waited for the Government's response to the report or for this debate, but have used the report as a lever in their areas to do something about the problem. They have used the report's recommendations to set up a dialogue with the health authorities. I was interested to hear that, on Merseyside, MIND has already entered into a contract with the health authority, under which, for each individual that MIND takes into its care from an institution, the health authority will pay £14,000 for his or her place. So far as I am aware, the scheme relates to places rather than to people. As the Minister is aware, there is a problem with the money ending with the death of the patient, because the organisation has a continuing expense, so I commend that type of deal. We should be seeking to ensure that organisations can undertake different forms of individual care, innovation and experimentation.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): May I refer the hon. Gentleman to my area health authority, which is closing the Mary Dendy hospital for the mentally disabled? It has first-class facilities such as a hydrotherapy pool. The care which will be available once the hospital is closed will not include such facilities nor those available in the Parkside hospital which is due to close during the next 10 years. Those two hospitals have sheltered workshops and many other excellent features which will not be replaced when they are closed. Will the patients have as good a standard of living and accommodation when they are discharged into the community as they had in the hospitals? Is that factor not important? Is it not vital that additional resources are made available to ensure that the facilities now provided in hospitals are provided when those patients go into the community?

Mr. Meadowcroft: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's comments. I recognise his interest and his anxiety about the difference between facilities available in institutions and in the community.

The problem is whether we should consider the quality of life as opposed to freedom, which cannot necessarily be measured by objects. That is a difficulty. In some ways it is not dissimilar from the way in which some people consider facilities for prisoners when they ask why they have four-star hotel accommodation while we suffer outside. None of those people would wish to be locked up behind doors. In a sense, people prefer the poverty of freedom to the wealth of slavery. People may prefer the quality of life in the community to the facilities provided for them in institutions. I accept what the hon. Gentleman said. We must find a balance. We have the task, which at times is not easy, of finding the right solution.

It was a pleasure to serve on the Select Committee. I hope that the Minister will take note of the fact that the report was unanimous. I am glad to see that it has been hailed as valuable by nearly all the specialist organisations. I hope that we shall see the proper, caring and sensitive dispatch of people with proper support out of the institutions into the community.

8.2 pm

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): Although I was a late joiner to the Select Committee, I should like to join in congratulating the Committee's advisers, who, I think both sides of the Committee felt, provided an excellent service.

I take as my starting point the definitive statement by the Select Committee in paragraph 29:

"Community care for mentally ill and mentally handicapped people is not a subject for partisan politics."

I believe that you will have observed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that is the spirit in which the debate has taken place so far, and I hope that it will so continue.

I congratulate the Government on having, first, endorsed and supported the concept of community care and on having devoted substantially increased funds to that principle. Since 1978, 51 per cent. more funds in real terms have been made available for the joint finance which is vital to the transfer of facilities from the hospital service to the community. The fact that year-on-year increases in schemes to which the health authority is also contributing are disregarded in terms of grant holdback is of additional benefit to hard-pressed local authorities. Those are useful steps towards financing community care.

Local authorities' personal social services expenditure has increased, not just in cash terms, but in real terms. In contrast to what is often held to be the case outside the House, the reality is a 15 per cent. increase in real terms on home helps, 9 per cent. in real terms on meals served in the home, more than 25 per cent. extra day centre places, not for the elderly, but for those who fall within the category of people with whom we are dealing, and a 26 per cent. increase in the provision for adult training centres. Those are achievements of which the Government should be proud.

The increases in expenditure are mirrored by service improvements. In 1983, 10 per cent. more people were visited at home by district nurses and health visitors, and nearly 25 per cent. more elderly people were treated by district nurses than when the Government came into office. What is more important, there are 51,000 places in day centres for the category of patient with whom we are dealing this evening. That is an increase of 18 per cent. since the Government took office. There are more places for mentally handicapped people at adult training centres.

The Government have provided special intiatives for community care. They have made £16 million available for a programme of special projects to provide alternatives to long-stay hospital care. The "Helping the Community to Care" initiative has been provided with £10·5 million. This is designed to help people care for elderly or handicapped people within the community. Local services for mentally ill elderly people have been given £6 million extra.

Support for the voluntary sector has increased from £7·5 million in 1978 to well in excess of £23 million. We must frame our observations to the Government in the light of an acceptance that they have devoted real extra resources to community care.

Having said that, we must acknowledge that the standard which the Government have set themselves is high. When the Select Committee sought a definition of community care which would describe what was meant by the concept, which is often quoted differently, it said:

"Appropriate care should be provided for individuals in such a way as to enable them to lead as normal an existence as possible given their particular disabilities and to minimise disruption of life within their community."

That is no easy task. It is no cheap task.

Having acknowledged what the Government have already done and are continuing to do, I believe that we should all be aware of the warning that the Select Committee sounded in paragraph 21, when it said:

"A decent community-based service for mentally ill or mentally-handicapped people cannot be provided at the same overall cost as present services. The proposition that community care could be cost-neutral is untenable."

The Committee continued, I believe correctly, more strongly when it said:

"Proceeding with a policy of community care on a cost-neutral assumption is not simply naive: it is positively inhumane. Community care on the cheap would prove worse in many respects than the pattern of services to date. The Minister of Health admitted—'If you have some hospital facility in the past which has been greatly underfunded, if you transfer the function to community care, the cost will go up.'"

Surely that is the background against which we must consider what community care means for the Health Service and social services.

We must beware of a number of pitfalls which potentially lie before us. I speak as a member of a health authority and as one interested in advancing the concept of community care. Other hon. Members will no doubt deal with other aspects of the report. I suggest to my right hon. and learned Friend that we should, for example, be careful to ensure that in the process of returning to the community those who are clearly able to return, we do not leave the worst disabled as a rump of patients in hospital, thus in a sense dedicating our asylum facilities, not by design, but by accident and by a process of attrition. That would be unfortunate and unhelpful. We should also beware that we do not become obsessed with those who are in hospital whom we are trying to get out.

One of the most significant observations made by the Select Committee was that we tend to think of the subject in terms of closing long-stay hospitals and putting people into the community. The speeches that we have heard so far have taken that course and talked about the closure of large institutions. The Committee noted an observation, which struck me at the time as singularly appropriate and important to remember—that 90 per cent. of the care is being provided in hospitals while 90 per cent. of the patients are living in the community.

We will have misunderstood the concept if we think that community care means only closing down the big long-stay institution to transfer people into the community. Community care is about the care of those who are already out of hospital and those who have never had the opportunity to be catered for even within the National Health Service.

We should be equally concerned to respect the concept of asylum. I was worried when the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) suggested that it was wrong for a health authority to say that it would close a long-stay institution but leave a facility on site for a reduced number of people. It would be wrong to leave a rump of patients who are difficult and for whom it is not convenient to make arrangements, but we have to come to terms with the concept of asylum for a limited number of people.

In west Berkshire we make a point of holding our health authority meetings in our long-stay mentally handicapped hospital because we are conscious of the fact that it is a Cinderella service. It is important that we go there. It is a good discipline because, once a month, we are able to walk around and see what is happening. I know the christian names of patients who could have walked out of that hospital 20 years ago to start the process of becoming members of society with occasional outpatient visits. As it is, they are incapable of ever making that transition. There are patients in that hospital, Borocourt hospital, who under no circumstances could be returned to the community.

Mrs. Renée Short: I said that.

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for clarifying her earlier remarks. We must not assume that community care means that nobody is allowed the protection of genuine asylum in the literal sense of that word, which the National Health Service ought to be able to afford.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: As my hon. Friend serves on a health authority, can he give us an assurance, from his own experience or from his experience of other authorities, that such provision is being made for the future and that there will be long-stay care and asylum care for a limited number of mentally ill patients?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend must direct his comments in another direction. I cannot give him any guarantees about what my right hon. and learned Friend may offer us at the conclusion of this debate. My authority recognises that the concept of asylum is vital, but we do not allow that to become a convenience for not making every effort to return the obvious patients, and perhaps the less obvious, to the community. I suspect that that is where the decision is important and where the veil needs to be parted. I am speaking about only a small number of people. I am convinced that, for the vast majority, the general thrust of the community care philosophy is right.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says, but does he agree that there is a danger that the more we talk about the people who are unable to be returned to the community the more we exaggerate their number? When the Select Committee went to see a project called Nimrod in Cardiff, we were told that people are selected for community care from a list and not according to their condition. We saw people who had been in an institution for 28 years and who are now living in the community. Nobody was prepared to admit that there was anybody in the institution who was not capable of being returned to the community. Intellectually, however, I accept the hon. Gentleman's contention that there must be some people who cannot be returned to the community.

Mr. Norris: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's observations. He is right constantly to re-examine the criteria used for retaining patients in an institution. It is possible to treat any patient, in any circumstances, in a private house if that is the aim. That cannot be the aim, however. It is vital that we get away from the idea that the private house is some kind of end in itself. We can use the private house for the vast majority of mental illness and mental handicap patients in the normalisation process, but the asylum concept remains valid for a small number of patients.

We have got past the easy side of community care. When it is obvious that patients can be returned to the community, most health authorities have developed plans to do that. We are now discussing the more difficult cases, and there are two things of which we must be extremely careful. The first is that we must not close facilities before we open others. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister has rightly reminded the House that that has not happened. I am worried that as large institutions begin to have fewer people the pressures on health authorities to speed up the process to get the last few dozen patients out will increase. We must protect those patients against the economic advantages of closing a facility too early.

When my right hon. and learned Friend gave evidence to the Select Committee, he spoke of the bridging arrangements in regard to the closure of our large institutions. My idea of bridging arrangements is not confined to capital bridging—the purchase of a house or several houses before selling the land and buildings of an institution. That is the conventional concept of a bridge, and I am most grateful for the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend recognises the need for such a facility.

More important for community care, however, is the following process. If a facility houses 400 patients and costs £400,000 a year to run, that represents £1,000 per patient. If one takes away 200 patients, that makes it £2,000 per year for each patient. If one is left with 20 patients, the deduction is obvious. It is also clear that my mathematics are at fault, but one adds many more noughts to the cost as the number of patients declines. The lesson is that as the number of patients retained in an institution drops, almost the same amount of money has to be spent as when a greater number of patients were housed in there. A major increase in resources is needed to tide us over a transitional period which will not last for one year, or two years, or even for 10.

Hospital care for the mentally handicapped and those who are mentally ill has not always been as good as it ought to be. If community care is to succeed, it must be done well. It is better not to do it at all than to do it badly. To do it well means that long-term extra expense will be involved. Extra costs will be incurred, not because it is more expensive to maintain a series of private houses than it is to maintain one large institution, but because we are saying that we will not allow Cinderella services to exist. Staffing ratios will have to be improved. A massive increase in resources will need to be allocated to day centres, adult training centres and occupational therapy departments.

Paragraph 28 of the Select Committee's report praises the staff of hospitals for the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped. It says:

> "There are not words powerful enough to praise the dedication of thousands of people who care for their mentally disabled fellows."

I have the privilege of seeing them just once a month. I am also privileged to be able to walk in and then walk out again. They are unable to do that. They have to stay in the Borocourt, Fairmile and Wayland hospitals in my constituency and in similar hospitals in the constituencies of right hon. and hon. Members.

In this unglamorous specialty, on very many occasions doctors work many more hours than their contracts stipulate. The nurses, both male and female, provide constant care, despite the almost intolerable frustration of lack of progress in their patients. Progress is usually made centimetre by centimetre. In many cases they work in less than ideal conditions. The Select Committee salutes them. They are an example to us all. They are entitled to know that this House cares about them and about the patients in their care. This debate is to be welcomed for this group of people, if for no other. I look forward to hearing what right hon. and hon. Friends have to say on this important subject.

8.23 pm

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): The Select Committee has provided a valuable service to the House, for its report contains a great deal of constructive thought and comment upon some difficult policy issues and it throws light on mainly difficult and sensitive areas. Since I am the first hon. Member who is not a member of the Select Committee to speak, I should put it on record that the Committee has provided a valuable source of reference on this subject.

My remarks will concentrate upon mental illness and the psychiatric services in which I have a special interest. In the East Suffolk district health authority there are two large, old-style mental hospitals: St. Clement's and St. Audrey's. How to deal with these matters often comes full circle. In the 1870s, the person in charge of St. Audrey's hospital wrote down his thoughts on mental illness and the way in which the service should be organised. In a thoughtful memorandum, which officially has not seen the light of day, he said that he believed that psychiatric services and services for the mentally ill should be dispersed in the community and that professional services should be dispersed in local areas, because this would be of far more benefit to those whom the services are designed to help. That only goes to show there are no new ideas and that old ideas are revamped.

I have to declare an interest as a sponsored member of the Confederation of Health Service Employees. Many of its members are in the front line of the provision of those services. It recruits heavily from ancillaries and nurses in the psychiatric sector. My comments are the result of what I have seen and heard. I recommend to the House a recent working party report by COHSE: the Mallinson report on the future of psychiatric services. It is a very important piece of research into the subject.

The term "community care" is not defined. A number of reports on community care have been published but none of them defines community care in detail. The professional recommendations about the best way forward vary greatly. There are major differences of professional opinion about the best way forward and about the ultimate shape of psychiatric care. However, a rough and ready definition involves the phasing out of the large, long-stay, old-style mental health hospitals. They have come in for a great deal of flak, but the work that is being done in two large hospitals in east Suffolk is of a very high order. It is often done in daunting circumstances.

On the other side of the coin, community care means that most people who need appropriate long-term care can and should be looked after in the community. I am advised that other features of community care will include multi-disciplinary community support, the relocation of specialist services in local settings, and the co-operation of the local authorities and personal social services. Of course, the whole structure will be underpinned by a framework of joint financial arrangements. However, I want to express some reservations about the concept of community care.

On the one hand a good deal must be said for such policies because the aim of all psychiatric therapy is to equip the individual to cope in the community. The ability to cope in the framework of everyday life is the measure of whether the person is improving and whether his mental condition is improving. That is an important principle, which I wholeheartedly accept. The other assumption is that the needs of the individual are best catered for in the community, within an integrated network of different professional services. Another advantage is that the support of families and voluntary support groups can be harnessed, and I think that that is a very valuable princple.

I think that most hon. Members will accept that far too many people have spent far too long in institutions of one sort or another. If one cannot cope very well and one goes into an institution, that institution and its framework become a crutch as time goes by, and people who have been institutionalised for a long time find the transition back to community life difficult.

While I have every sympathy with the aims of community care policies, and while I accept the proposition that, as a society, we must mobilise community resources in a structured way to help those who are mentally ill, I have reservations on the way in which they are being put into operation. In the first place, community care is not a cheap, but an expensive option. To provide a framework of support services is potentially expensive. There were certain economies of scale—if I can put it in economic terms—in having people under one roof in the old-style mental hospitals. That cost option is no longer available as the old hospitals are closed. To echo the words of the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), who served on the Select Committee, there is no possibility that the Government will be able to get away with that policy at a reduced cost. In my view that is not possible. Such a view has long been on the record. For instance, the Nodder report of 1980 said that the advantages of community care were doubtful if no extra resources in real terms were to be provided. That has long been realised by people in the profession.

An important point is that when people are released into the community they then become the partial responsibility of the families concerned and there is sometimes an intolerable strain on family life if the support services are not properly organised. I have encountered cases in my constituency where families are having a job to cope. I notice from paragraph 45 of the Select Committee report that a general practitioner said:

> "I have never been asked for my opinion in 27 years of practice as to whether somebody's family could cope with them if they were discharged, let alone invited to a case conference."

That is a serious point to make. There is no point in discharging people into the community if the burden on the individual families is intolerable.

If the responsibilities for those services are divided between local authorities and the NHS, there is a very great danger of a confusion of responsibility and no clear line of authority as to the development of those services. I accept what the Minister of Health said when he challenged my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) to quote an example of a hospital having been closed too quickly before the existing services could take over and cope. Nevertheless that danger should be borne in mind. If there is any rush to close those large hospitals before the framework has been adequately prepared in the community, significant problems will be thrown up.

In my view, if we are looking at the future shape of the framework, psychiatric services and services for mental illness should continue to be an NHS responsibility. In 1979 the Royal Commission on the Health Service said:

"The capacity of local authorities to develop services and in particular residential accommodation for those who are considerably mentally disturbed may have been overestimated."

In the polite diplomatic language of a Royal Commission, that meant that it is casting serious doubt upon the capacity of some local authorities to take the strain of that problem when the difficulties start to accumulate. I believe that the Royal Commission was right. Leaving the responsibility with the NHS is the only way to prevent considerable variations in the quality of community services up and down the country. That is a well-established point. When services are left to local authorities, they vary considerably in quality from place to place. We should not take such a risk with mental illness and psychiatric health. Therefore, I should be most doubtful that in some cases that was the right way forward.

I did not stand up to speak in the debate prepared to argue about finance. I am simply not an expert on that, so I could not sustain the argument. Even on a prime facie observation, local authorities themselves have been the object of quite complex financial constraints. I am not debating the merits of that one way or the other, but the point must be made that fundamental objections can be made to a system of finance for psychiatric services that depends on a redistribution of funding between the NHS and personal social services. I do not see that as a coherent financial way forward.

Funding community care can be too easily disguised so that one is not increasing real resources but merely shifting current resources through complicated book-keeping and the mechanism of joint funding. If we are not careful, community care can turn into community neglect where people get lost.

Already there is great concern among those who have spent a lifetime with mentally ill patients—people who are mentally ill to one degree or another—that there might be dire consequences if mistakes are made in the policy. At time of rate-capping, financial targets, and financial penalties, together with the progressive reductions in the rate support grant, is not a good time to be talking of increased local responsibility for the critical service for the mentally ill.

The burdens of mental illness will increase as elderly people form a bigger proportion of the community, and the psychogeriatric services will come under much strain. A few years ago the audit inspectorate reported that there were wide variations between one local authority and another, and their abilities to cope with the problems that I have described are in many cases limited. Local authorities are too proud to abdicate their responsibilities to private institutions which are often of a doubtful quality.

The needs of patients and those who suffer from mental illness should be paramount and should not be subject to considerations of lowering costs and closing old hostels as quickly as possible. The services should be firmly and emphatically under the control of the National Health Service because only that kind of control can ensure equality of provision and, I hope, a high standard of provision between one area and another. These services should not be left to local authority backwoodsmen. There should be a fully integrated service within the context of the National Health Service. One hopes that in the long run the psychiatric service can lose the stigma and, indeed, the reality of having been for too long a Cinderella service.

Health and Personal Social Services

8.42 pm

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I welcome this important debate on a subject with which I have been associated for some 10 years. I congratulate the hon. Lady the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) and her Committee on their work in producing such an excellent report.

I recall an occasion in the early 1970s when the present Secretary of State for Education and Science, who was then Secretary of State for Social Services came down to my constituency to open the Tree Tops centre for mentally handicapped children. It is a wonderful centre which has developed over the years. What sticks in my memory is that, when he entered the hall with all the dignatories and people gathered there, the music being played was Gilbert and Sullivan. As he came in, the song from the Mikardo which started up was "Behold the Lord High Executioner". I have reminded him of that on several occasions since. My right hon. Friend was responsible then for the launching of a major Government initiative for the mentally handicapped, and much of the progress made since then is due to his initiative at that time.

I should like to pay tribute to the record of my local health authority, Exeter health authority, because it is probably one of the leaders in the country in the progress being made in moving patients out of the old institutions and into new staffed hostels and local support units. The latest progress report which the authority has just sent me reads:

> "All programmes are on target and entering a most interesting phase as the new community services open, offering a greater variety of help and support than was ever possible by the central hospitals."

I am very proud of the authority's record and I keep in close contact with it. It is one of the authorities we can look to, and I am sure that the Select Committee found that when its members went there. I do not want to dwell on the overall situation and go back over points which have been raised by other hon. Members. However, I stress that there is a good working relationship between the health authority in Exeter and the local social services department. That seems to be why the financial resources and the staff can be switched across the resource fields. That has happened there, and it ought to be possible to achieve the same benefits and progress elsewhere.

I should like to raise three separate issues which concern us in the all-party disablement group and which require urgent answers and action from the Government. The first concerns children in long-stay hospitals and institutions; the second relates to emergency alarm systems, which are important to those who come out of institutions and require help in their own homes; and the third is my concern about board and lodging payments. Only a small number of children are in long-stay mental hospitals, but the matter is urgent in terms of the lives of those involved.

At a recent meeting of the all-party disablement group, representatives from Exodus came to speak to us. That is an organisation concerned entirely with getting children out of long-stay hospitals. Exodus has just produced a report called "Still There" which shows that in England and Wales 450 children are still living in hospitals with 25 beds or more. Not only are children still living in the hospitals, but new admissions to those hospitals are still taking place. There were four admissions this year, and the last one was in May in the west midlands. Surely children should be receiving child care and not medical care in the sense of being in hospital institutions. It is quite wrong for them to be in hospital beds under institutionalised care.

Tremendous success has been achieved in recent years in moving children out of hospitals. In 1980 the then Secretary of State said that there were more than 2,000 children in long-stay hospitals. We are now down to 450, so I am not cavilling at the progress which has been made. One of the principal reasons which makes the statistics appalling is that many of the children have reached the age of 16 and are no longer counted in child statistics. The question must be asked, what happens to them when they reach the age of 16? Many of them have no alternative but to go back into hospital.

If we look at the statistics for those under the age of 16 living in hospitals with 25 or more beds, it is clear that there is a wide disparity between the regional health authorities that have successfully taken children out of hospitals and those that have not. For instance, Wessex and the North-West regional health authorities have all but completed the removal of children from their hospitals. On the other hand, the authorities in the west midlands, south-east Thames and Oxford each have more than 45 children living in hospitals. A number of health authorities have more than 10 children living in hospitals.

I should like to see a final onslaught by the Minister to remove the remaining children, to get it all over with. At the same time, we must look at the type of care they will be going into. The all-party disablement group accepted the recommendation by Exodus that there was a need for the Government to add emphasis to circulars already issued requesting action in this area. Prime responsibility for the care of children must lie with the Social Services Department, and the first step is to ensure that each child is reviewed by the social, health service and education authorities, and the second step is to ensure that the results of their reviews are implemented.

I should like to draw attention to early-day motion 844 which calls upon regional health authorities and the Government to take urgent action to remove these 450 children from long-stay mental handicap hospitals and to find them appropriate accommodation in the community. We want an immediate end to the admission of children to hospitals. The Government have achieved a great deal in the last few years, but in his summing up, I hope my right hon. and learned Friend will agree that the Government must take such action and add some impetus to the action which requires to be taken by the regional health authorities.

Another problem referred to the all-party disablement group concerns emergency alarm systems. Here I have a specific point to raise concerning the legislative provisions governing the grants and allowances for the installation and planning of alarm systems. For many people, particularly elderly people, an alarm system might prevent them from being rehoused in alternative accommodation. I should like to raise a number of points and ask my right hon. and learned Friend to look at them. However, I do not necessarily expect detailed answers tonight.

For example, do the housing benefit regulations of 1982, which allow for benefit to be paid to cover rental and running costs of an entry phone or intercom system for the proper enjoyment of the dwelling, include emergency alarm systems? Do the provisions in the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 to allow local authorities to make financial provisions for "aids to daily living" cover emergency alarm systems?' Under the Supplementary Benefits (Single Payments) Regulations a benefit officer is able to grant a single payment if it is the only means by which serious damage or risk to health or safety can be prevented. Is there a case for giving more guidance about this regulation, as the typical user of an emergency alarm system would satisfy it?

These are just some of the areas that need clarification. I hope that they will be considered tonight and that answers will be given in due course.

The vexed question of board and lodging payments gives rise to concern because of the effect that they will have on residential care and nursing homes, and the implications of that for the provision of care in the community for the mentally handicapped and mentally ill. Many homes are finding it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to priovide good care within the new financial limits.

A number of glaring anomalies in the new regulations have led to the situation whereby those who require the most special care are unable to pay for it within the existing limit. The two anomalies are, first, that local authorities do not have the power to top up payments to people over pension age or in nursing homes and, secondly, that, while the new level is £170 a week for a person disabled under pension age, it is only £110 a week for someone who becomes disabled after pension age.

As to people over pension age who suffer from either a mental disorder or a mental handicap, it is not clear from the regulations whether they qualify for a slightly higher limit. I should be extremely grateful if the Minister would clarify that point. Even if they qualify, the rate for someone suffering from a mental disorder but not a mental handicap is £120 a week, but for someone suffering from a mental handicap it is £140 a week. These limits do not account for the additional care that many mentally handicapped and mentally ill people require.

If a home is unable to provide care for an elderly person at £110 a week, that person is unable to look to the local authority for topping up. Such people are therefore faced with a number of options. If they have been living at home, they can continue to live at home but presumably in inappropriate accommodation. Alternatively, they can look for a home that can accommodate them at the given price. That home is most unlikely to be able to provide them with the care that they require, and it is likely to be well away from where they have always lived. The third situation arises for someone who has been living in a hospital for the mentally handicapped. Those people have no alternative but to continue to live in the hospital because they are unable to pay to live in a residential or nursing home. The result is that appropriate care in the community is not being provided.

As to the different limits between those disabled before pension age and those disabled after pension age, it is highly likely that someone becoming disabled after pension age will have to remain in hospital much longer than should be necessary. Alternatively, such people may find a second-rate home, but again that is likely to be away from where they have always lived.

The limits are proving difficult anyway, but they are penalising most severely those homes that provide special facilities and place emphasis on rehabilitation. Their costs, and consequently their fees, are inevitably higher as they provide physiotherapy, occupational therapy and general welfare facilities. Basically, they are providing more than just board and lodging, and if we are looking for good practice for care in the community, we must look towards the provision of these additional facilities.

As well as hitting hardest the most severely disabled people, these regulations also hit the voluntary homes, because in the main the voluntary homes provide care for the most severely disabled people. Generally speaking, such care is not something that private homes wish to take on. The regulations are clobbering those homes that are providing genuine care at a genuine price for the sake of putting an end to those other homes that have been guilty of abusing the regulations in the past.

The regulations present us with a complete overhaul of the whole system of payments to people in residential and nursing care. It appears that very little consideration has been given to the mechanics of the system. The general understanding of the regulations is that local authorities will pay for residents and then claim back from the resident what he or she has claimed in supplementary benefit from the DHSS. For people under pensionable age, the difference in the charge and the money from the DHSS will be paid by the local authority, and that is the topping up to which I have already referred.

Reports have been coming through—in the last week such a report came through to the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation—that local authorities are totally unable to work out exactly what their responsibilities are. They are reluctant to pay for a resident unless they can be sure that they will be able to recover the supplementary benefit from the resident. Therefore, the resident must apply for supplementary benefit from the DHSS, which will not award it until that resident has a place in a residential home. That is a bureaucratic nightmare that is most certainly slowing up the whole process for the person who needs to go into a residential home or nursing care.

I fully understand that these changes are being monitored very carefully and that the payments limits are being kept under review, but I cannot stress too emphatically that this is an extremely urgent problem. I know that the Minister is looking at representations from various organisations and that a number of them are collating information on how these residential care homes will be affected. But unless some immediate changes are made—and very soon—it will be too late, and many horrifying and distorting stories will reach the press, just as we have seen with the effect that the changes have had on young people under the age of 26.

I know that my right hon. and learned Friend is aware of these problems and that he and the Government wish to correct them as soon as possible. Until they are corrected, and until these other anomalies are wiped out, we shall not achieve our objective of real care in the community. I hope that these points will be taken seriously by my right hon. and learned Friend and that he will deal with some of them when he replies.

8.58 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The reference to Exeter by the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. M. Hannam) were accurate, because the Select Committee, which visited that area, was impressed by the standard of care and facilities provided. But that contrasts markedly with some of the other things that members of the Select Committee saw.

My experience of that Select Committee was one of great personal learning, and to some extent profound horror, about some of the things that still exist, especially in our large and older mental institutions. It has been said on many occasions, and it is worth repeating, that as a society we have condemned many people to conditions that ought to be unacceptable in this day and age.

The Minister and all those who gave evidence to the Committee accepted and re-emphasised those comments. As a Parliament and as a society we have to shape up. We must not pay lip service to the idea of getting away from these institutions. We must first make sure that this is done in a proper and acceptable fashion. It must be recognised that we are talking about individuals coming out of institutions and not statistics. Secondly, we must ensure that we do not move people into new and smaller institutions which offer nothing in the spirit of community care. That is probably the single most important thing that I gained from the Committee's deliberations.

The point was hammered home time after time that there are many extremely worrying examples. For example, attempts have been made to establish structures which were not appropriate to the enhancement of the lives of individuals. The whole ethos of community care is so individual that it is virtually impossible to find global solutions or to operate from outright diktats from the centre. The Minister for Health has said on different occasions that it is necessary to give that type of discretion at local level. It involves a whole new ethos of attitudes to community care.

There is a need, for example, for very close co-ordination by different agencies. I am concerned, despite the comments of those who feel happier, that there is still dislocation between the health authorities and the Department of Health and Social Security and others who are the professional carers, such as general practitioners and those in society with responsibility. That sentiment was echoed by the response of the directors of the social services to the Select Committee report in which they drew attention to what they felt was a lack of co-ordination. I am worried that if that lack of co-ordination is allowed to continue and develop we shall end up, 40 years on, with everybody saying that we have failed as a society to cater for the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped and that it was not our fault but somebody else's.

A dispute has arisen between the North-Western regional health authority and almost all others concerned about the level of funding passed from the health authority to the local authorities when individuals are transferred from the care of one to the other. The North-Western regional health authority has been using the figure of £11,300 as the amount which should pass with each individual placement. I was interested in the comments of the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft), who pointed out that on Merseyside £14,000 was transferred from the health authority to MIND when it undertook such a task.

The city of Manchester has calculated that a figure of £19,000 would be more reasonable. The Minister raises his eyebrows, but the regional health authority is insisting upon a figure which the local health authorities and others concerned feel is inadequate. I know of a case within the Trafford local authority area where a considerable delay ensued before a person was accepted for transfer from an institution to a community-based structure. The result was that the quality of his life considerably deteriorated. The local authority could not afford to develop its own facilities fast enough because of lack of money from the health authority, which is also not happy with the situation.

When I raised the matter in a written question, the Minister made a very fair point and one which I would concede completely. He said:

> "I am not convinced that the production of a centrally compiled account of funding arrangements within individual regions would be helpful without an equally detailed account of the service developments proposed."—[Official Report, 4 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 246.]

I accept the Minister's point about something that, by its very definition, if it is to be adequate community care, has to be so individually based that prescriptions cannot be given from the Elephant and Castle or any large area health authority.

Nevertheless, we have to accept that, even dealing with individually based services, it is necessary to take account of the central funding of resources. The difficulties of which I have spoken will show that the funding is inadequate. It is not satisfactory to allow one authority to blame another. In years to come, we should not be saying that it was a good change of concept but in practical terms had no impact because the different approaches would not, or could not, work together.

Health authorities feel themselves to be constrained by financing problems, and for obvious reasons are reluctant to pass across any more money than the minimum with which they can get away. That is not surprising, but it runs counter to the concept of community care. We should be asking about the individual, not whether he should be transferred out of the institution and into the community but what resources and facilities need to be made available within society to allow him to live an adequate, independent and fulfilled life. Inevitably, that means that we, as a society, have to accept the high resourcing cost. I fear that, the way that the funding of both local authorities and health services is going, we shall not see that.

It is important to draw attention to some of the things that the Select Committee said. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) spoke of the important matter of families and the resources given to them. He spoke about the needs of the family and the need for adequate support for family members caring for others in the family. One witness to the Committee pointed out that professional carers are caring within professional working hours, but members of a family care for 24 hours a day, seven days a week and even, sometimes, 52 weeks a year. We must do much more to make the role of family carers more simple.

Recommendation 36 says:

> "We recommend that local authorities give priority to providing respite care sensitive to the varying needs of different people."

They specifically means respite for those caring within the family structure.

The hon. Member for Exeter touched on the important new board and lodgings regulations. When the Minister attended the Select Committee's meetings, he was questioned closely about the position of people who were moved out into various hostels and houses in multiple occupation. The Committee pointed out that local authorities should be given power to designate as residential care private homes with more than a given proportion of dependent residents.

Many people move to such places from institutions. The standard of care, as far as the Committee could make out, is grossly inadequate. It is necessary that there should be some means of checking and some responsibility on the local authorities to guarantee that the interests of people in such accommodation is protected. That means that there must be adequate licensing and adequate inspection and monitoring arrangements to make such places work properly. The Committee said that community care is not a cheap option, as many hon. Members have already pointed out, and it is important that we recognise that.

I have quoted figures and the Minister might quote different figures. It is certain that the lower cost individuals—if that is not a too inappropriate way to describe human beings—are transferred from institutions first. However, the cost of care in the community is rising. If we are not merely to give lip service to the spirit of the report, we shall have to rethink our attitudes to social provision for all those who live devalued lives. I am referring not only to the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped, but to the homeless and young disaffected people. We shall have to rethink social provisions.

We have no cheap option. We cannot simply say, "Yes, we have a big heart." We must make resources available to ensure that we provide local services. The needs of individuals are not cheap to provide. Society will not find it cheap to provide facilities for all those involved in community care and community living—the families, the professional carers and the extended carers.

We have to make a commitment. I see no evidence of a movement towards making that commitment and I find that sad. If the Select Committee report is left to gather dust we shall miss a massive opportunity.

9.12 pm

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) gave a competent précis of the Select Committee report. I began to wonder whether there would be anything left for anyone else to say. However, the hon. Lady used a slant of her own, with that brusque charm which we have come to know and cherish. In her exposition she did not start at square one of the Select Committee's deliberations.

I was pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) referred to the definition of community care. One must first define it and then ask whether as defined it is right. There was much debate in the Select Committee, which has not been illustrated in tonight's debate, about whether the concept of community care was right. The debate continues in the country.

The oral and visual evidence given to the Select Committee overwhelmingly stated that the principles of a community-based, flexible response policy to the needs of mentally ill and mentally handicapped people was right. That is not a matter of administrative convenience or of cost, but a matter of the quality of life.

In the more personal nature of smaller treatment units, particularly family-sized units, there is a degree of self-reliance and responsibility which has a curative effect upon the majority of mentally ill and mentally handicapped people, and gives them a better quality of life.

In the last 15 years enormous strides have been made in the quality of life of physically disabled people, although much more remains to be done. We must now start to do the same for mentally disabled people. Two or three years ago the Government set the ball rolling by giving priority within the Health Service to the mentally handicapped and mentally ill. The Select Committee report is another milestone in a crusade to improve the lot of mentally ill and mentally handicapped people.

Two key factors in the Select Committee report are vital — flexibility and individualism. Individual needs are important, and when one considers discharging a person from hospital and changing the method of care an individual care plan must be developed. This requires a host of alternative approaches, as we discovered as the Select Committee travelled in the United Kingdom and the United States. It may be a core and cluster arrangement —rare in practice, but common in theory—of extended family dwellings, small staffed homes, hospital-type establishments with 20 to 25 beds, or even larger establishments. That is why I say that there must be flexibility. Each area must develop its own policies, and it would be wrong to rule out the idea of a 50 or 100-bed unit, because in certain circumstances that may be an appropriate way of dealing with the problems of the mentally ill and mentally handicapped.

Mr. Weetch: The hon. Gentleman has made some interesting comments about the quality of life for the mentally ill. If it is to be a community-based policy, he must accept that the community is still suspicious of the mentally ill. If, therefore, a mentally ill person is discharged into a community in which suspicion is abroad, to put it no higher than that, because there is insufficient understanding of mental illness, his discharge may mean the reverse of increasing his quality of life.

Mr. Galley: From the units which he Select Committee visited, the weight of evidence seems to be that going into the community and having some self-reliance has a curative effect on the individuals concerned. There may have to be, at least initially, a large measure of staff support, cushioning the effects of a community which may not react well. However, as one sees, for example, wth drug misuse clinics and rehabilitation centres which are closely associated with the community, those barriers can quickly break down.

My right hon. and learned Friend may be bored with the same point being made to him. It is, however, important that points relating to discharge are made by hon. Members in all parts of the House, because it is among the most important issues that the Select Committee considered. There is no evidence from this country that people have been discharged into the community and then not properly looked after. In the United States, however, there was substantial evidence that that had happened there.

We must make sure, therefore, that an imaginative and flexible range of alternatives—from the small, family-sized unit to the larger unit—are available in the community before hospitals are closed. In other words, proper care plans must be developed before people are discharged into the community.

[Mr. Galley]

Much has been said abut bridging finance. Joint finance, with people being taken into the community with a cost tag, as it were, attached to them, will not solve all the problems that will be presented as we develop the policy of discharge into the community.

It will be possible in my area of Calderdale to carry out an imaginative response to the discharge of such people only by the provision of considerable central finance. That finance, welcome though it will be, will not be available in all areas. Considerable capital consequences will arise from each change as it takes place, and that will arise before any savings are realised from closing large, impersonal hospital complexes.

Some flexible arrangements for bridging finance are helpful. They will have to be developed into a system with a more formalised central bridging fund, and that will involve initial money being provided by the Department of Health and Social Security. Out of such a fund, money can be donated for immediate needs, and gradually assets will accumulate which, in time, can be used to build up a network of community care facilities. In due course that network will be completed and the money that has accumulated will be available for other Health Service provision. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will give considerable and detailed thought to that approach.

There is a small proportion of the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped for whom radical change may not be appropriate. Some are suffering from multiple handicap or are so ill that they would not be able to cope with any sort of community facility. Such people form a small minority, but we must recognise that they exist. There are others who are old, and a change in their environment would be counter-productive. There may be a requirement to move from a large building to a small building, but we are discussing individuals for whom there cannot be change. These people will be unable to move from an environment that is essentially institutionalised to one that is community based.

As the process of change gathers pace there will be lessons to be learned. There will be a need for small adjustments to policy as time passes. In developing the strategy, the advice of the Select Committee is, "We agree that this approach is right, and let us get on with the job, but festina lente. Let us do so with sensitivity and care."

There is a need for radical change, but it must be accompanied by careful thought and full preparation. The growing pace of community care provision will mean changes for staff in many disciplines. The staff will need new skills and attitudes. The change of focus from the hospital to the community will not always be easy. The development of multi-discipline approaches and the breaking down of rigid demarcations will be extremely important. The evidence suggests that the dedicated staff who run our mental illness and mental handicap services have embraced change with considerable enthusiasm. However, there are small groups that will be resistent to change. The Select Committee met a degree of resistance from psychiatrists and from other sources as its members visited various parts of the country. However, in practically every instance the professional bodies were supportive of the new policies and the change of focus.

Undoubtedly an element of caution is proper, especially among psychiatrists and the various shortage specialties that are involved in dealing with the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped. We need to balance the airing and resolution of anxieties with the need to make progress with successful change. The trend towards community care will be only one of the pressures that will lead to change in the work of general practice.

The presence of the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped in the community will place greater pressures on general practitioners. It is right that they should be involved closely in the treatment of people once they have been discharged from hospital. General practitioners must be deeply involved in the treatment of those who have never been in a hospital. One senses that at times general practitioners have been resistent and reluctant to be involved closely in the care of these people, but they have to co-operate with many others. The involvement of GPs will mean that they, the GPs, will need to manage their time more efficiently and optimise the use of their skills. They will need to free themselves from more minor asks that can be dealt with by nurses, or pharmacists, for example.

There will need to be flexibility. For example, GPs will have to be prepared to refer patients to community psychiatric nurses, and the role of the nurse will need to develop within a team approach. An excellent service is currently being provided. It is just beginning to grow and to make an impact upon us and we must give it considerable assistance. If we are to make the best use of CPN services, it will be necessary for more staff to move into that area. That will create a need for proper training and deployment and a more coherent approach to their terms and conditions of employment as compared with hospital-based staff. Within the development of CPNs and community nursing services, more parts of the country must place emphasis on developing community mental handicap teams.

The Select Committee was impressed by the amount of co-operation between a range of medical, nursing and social service professionals and stressed the need to strengthen that co-operation. Gone are the days when different professionals worked in their own tight little boxes. There is an increasing need for the co-operation of equals.

It is too easy to become involved in sterile arguments about administrative structures, but there may come a time when, as these services develop and barriers are broken down, we need to provide administratively as well as practically a combined health and social service system.

Greater co-operation, a reduction in barriers and increased sensitivity are needed by DHSS staff dealing with social security, because they become increasingly important when the mentally ill and mentally handicapped live in the community. The benefit entitlement of people moved out of hospital into local authority or NHS regulated accommodation is an important consideration. There seems to be an inconsistency in the operation of the various regulations when people change from one type of accommodation to another. Significant changes in accommodation may not be dealt with sensitively by social security staff.

Rigidity, whether in social security, social service or medical matters, is the wrong approach towards the mentally ill and mentally handicapped. I hope that we shall develop a flexible, individualised system. I was encouraged by the suggestions in the social security reviews that the social fund could be used flexibly to meet the need for community care as people are discharged into the community and that a sensitive evaluation should be made of the needs of the mentally ill and mentally handicapped to give a new quality to their lives.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I compliment the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) on the sense of the points that he made which were drawn from his experience as a member of the Select Committee. I was not a member of that Committee, so my comments will be brief.

The Committee's report is excellent, featuring a number of practical challenges that face us and bringing us face to face with the question whether we have the commitment to carry out the programmes leading to the integration in the community of the mentally handicapped or mentally ill. I shall concentrate on mental handicap, because I have more knowledge of that aspect, but many of my points will relate to mental illness as well.

The Committee's brief was geared mainly to the position in England, but the Committee also went to Cardiff. The success or failure of the Welsh initiatives with respect to policies for the mentally handicapped is relevant to the thrust of the report. A few years ago, the "All Wales Strategy for the Development of Services for Mentally Handicapped People" suggested not long-stay hospitals but 36-bed or 48-bed hospitals as a means towards integration in the community of the mentally handicapped. The horrified reaction of many people not only in Wales but elsewhere led to the good strategy which we now have which was described in the November Mencap conference in Madrid, which I attended, as the best theoretical plan in western Europe. Unfortunately, theory and practice are not always the same, and we are experiencing considerable difficulties in turning many aspects of the plan into reality.

In the context of the Select Committee's report, it is worth noting three main principles of the "All Wales" strategy. It is important to note that it is written into the strategy that "these general principles apply to all mentally handicapped people, however severe their handicaps."

The first is:

"Mentally handicapped people should have a right to normal patterns of life within the community."

That is also the main thrust of the Select Committee report. Secondly:

"Mentally handicapped people should have a right to be treated as individuals."

This means that they and their families must play a full part in decisions intended to help them. Clearly, it is easier for the less acutely handicapped to take a meaningful part in decisions affecting them and to practise self-advocacy. For those who are not capable of personal direct involvement, the advocacy service must be developed to ensure that their needs and requirements are taken fully into account. In due course, we may need to address our minds to developing a structure to ensure that.

Thirdly, the strategy states:

"Mentally handicapped people require additional help from the communities in which they live and from professional services if they are to develop their maximum potential as individuals."

That them has emerged time and again in today's debate. We are not talking about cut-price options. We are talking about what is right and gives people dignity and a meaningful life as opposed to the terrible existences that they have led in long-stay hospitals over the years. Making this system work is thus likely to require greater rather than smaller resources, especially during the interim period, and I am glad that the Select Committee report addresses itself to that aspect.

As the long-stay hospitals move out into the community, the patients most capable of doing so will go out while those who remain are likely to be those with the most problems and in need of the greatest resources. In any case, the overheads will remain to be met for a considerable period. Regrettably, some patients may never move out into the community, although we should aim to get as many as possible out of the long-stay hospitals and into suitable care.

There will thus be a parallel demand for community-based services and for continuity of the hospital services and it is important that the Government clearly accept that. The morale of many people in the Health Service is low because they are uncertain about what is to happen to the hospitals and to their own involvement as the emphasis shifts to the social services. I am sure that the Select Committee is right to state in recommendation No. 55:

"In the long-term, this inquiry has confirmed that the separation of health and social services for mentally disabled people is illogical and inimical to joint services. Some means of eventually bringing the two services together is desirable, which would not destroy the present degree of integration of social services with other local authority services, nor diminish the priority given by either the NHS or local authorities to mental disability services."

It is important that that should be placed on the record. We must work towards that end, not by drawing social services away from local authorities but by bringing the Health Service at the sharp end—the local, consumer end—closer to the local government structure. If we are to make care in the community meaningful, we must develop locally based domiciliary services because the kind of service that is provided on an institutional basis in long-stay hospitals will be equally needed by people living in small groups or in their own homes. The services will be much more difficult to arrange, but they must be provided if people are not to miss out.

I take the example of medical services. Many general practitioners have no training and very little experience of handling mentally handicapped people, who occasionally become ill just as anyone else does. General practitioners may need some specialised knowledge to treat and respond to those patients. The same applies to nurses in ordinary hospitals into which mentally handicapped people may need to go for a few days. There needs to be an awareness of the training available for the staff who are dealing with them.

We heard from the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) of the need to turn off the tap as a first step towards integration, and to ensure that no young people under 16 go into long-stay hospitals. That has been the objective of successive Governments, but regrettably we are a long way from achieving it.

We heard some disturbing figures in the all-party disablement group last week. I subsequently tabled a question relating to Wales. I asked how many young people under 16 are resident in long-stay hospitals in Wales, and I find that there are 43 such persons there now in 20 long-stay hospitals or units to which they may go. I now have an update on the figures that were given last week, and apparently 10 such people have been admitted during 1985. If we are not getting things right at that end, we shall never get the integration into the community that we seek.

I am glad to say that integration is happening in some places. In my constituency last Friday, the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Conwy (Mr. Roberts), was present with me at the opening of a community-based facility. I think that the Minister and other hon. Members will be interested to hear about it.

A constituent and good friend of mine, Gwynn Davies, and his wife Mary, who have a mentally handicapped son who is now in his twenties, had determined to get a community-based facility for mentally handicapped people in their own village. They set up a non-profit-making company, with trustees, and with 200 villagers as shareholders in the company, to develop a small community home for three mentally handicapped people, a shop in which they can work, and a few acres of land in which they can do agricultural and horticultural work. They are getting the financial support that is necessary from the public sector through the Welsh Office and the "All Wales" strategy.

That is an example of enthusiasm on a voluntary basis within the community being tied together with the resources that are available only through the public sector and the state, to get development on a human level on a scale that is meaningful to the people that will benefit from it. Unfortunately, not every village in Wales or in England has a Gwynn and Mary Davies, but many of them have the boys and girls and the men and women who need that sort of initiative.

The challenge is, how do we get community-based services integrated into the community to grow with the enthusiasm and the flair that is seen in the sort of project that I mentioned without becoming bureaucratic on a small scale, in the same way that the long-stay hospitals are bureaucratic on a larger scale? It is not an easy aim to achieve, but it can be done. Three or four years ago I saw how people had succeeded in doing it in Sweden by making sure that the resources, the commitment and the determination were present.

If we are to turn the theory into practice, we need a tremendous commitment. We have to avoid the pitfalls of bureaucracy. We have to avoid putting people into jobs and thinking that by appointing more theoretical people behind desks we shall succeed. We must have people who are enthusiastic at the sharp end. It is a challenge to every Government, and one that is worthy of the effort.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I think it would be wise to pay tribute to the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short). She will be leaving the House at the end of this Parliament and she will be greatly missed. She has held together in the Committee a very disparate bunch of people. Whatever our arguments and disagreements, we owe her a great deal for her deeds and commitment to social services and to the welfare of our disabled people thoroughout the country.

The hon. Lady said that the nub of the question is resources, and I hope that the House will recognise that the chance of getting those resources for the National Health Service and local authorities is much better under this Administration than under any previous one.

In the last decade, the cash allocated to the National Health Service — for example, the current money for England—has gone up by three times, but in real terms we have seen a steady rise since this Parliament took office in 1979, compared with a fall in real terms in the mid-1970s.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) produced many figures. With everyone else, I have done 60 hours work this week already and, like him, I tend to find that figures start to become a little peculiar when one has not had much sleep. Therefore, I shall merely draw attention to the trend. The fall in real terms in the mid-1970s took place when the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) was the Labour Minister for Health. One wishes to put that on the record and say, so much for his comments about nurses during Prime Minister's Question Time this afternoon.

During Prime Minister's Question Time, questions were raised about whether the Conservative Government want more public expenditure and what our attitude is. The Prime Minister said that the key factor was the percentage of GDP represented by this public expenditure. We should put on record the fact that the allocation to the National Health Service under this Administration has consistently been about 2·9 per cent. of GDP, which compares with 2·5 per cent. or 2·6 per cent. under the Labour Government.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a falling total.

Mrs. Currie: It was not on a falling total — [Interruption.] I invite the hon. Gentleman to intervene.

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Lady is talking about maintaining expenditure on the Health Service, which is not true. There have been significant cuts in many areas of the Health Service. Secondly, there have been massive cuts in other areas of public expenditure, which increase the proportion of expenditure on the National Health Service without improving patient care where it matters.

Mrs. Currie: I am talking about current expenditure in the National Health Service in England. My figures come from the Library. The hon. Gentleman is entitled to do as I did and ask the Library to give him the objective figures for expenditure. In real terms, in cash terms and in the percentage of GDP, this Government have done a great deal better than the Government of the party to which he claims to belong.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member to say that I claim to belong to a political party when I have been a member of that party for 19 years and intend to remain so?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have heard nothing that is out of order so far.

Mrs. Currie: We often hear silly comments from the Opposition, and perhaps one might comment——

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Lady should know all about silly comments.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman has not been here for most of this debate. He is never here for other debates on the Health Service and social security matters. He might do better to listen to somebody who is.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member to mouth inaccuracies? I have been here for most of this debate and I attend almost every debate on health and social services as a spokesperson for my union, the National Union of Public Employees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Inaccuracies seem to be part of the daily diet here, although I must say that the hon. Gentleman has been here for most of the time that I have occupied the Chair.

Mrs. Currie: Apart from the rather silly comments that we have heard during the past few minutes, may I draw attention to the comments of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) in the Daily Telegraph last Saturday. He said that the real growth in the NHS that has been provided by the Government is not real growth because it has been swallowed up by demography and by the increased costs of equipment and of pay. I would point out to the hon. Gentleman—who has not graced us with his presence today at all—that no rules said that we had to provide the extra money for demography. No rules say——

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Currie: In a minute. Sit down.

There are no rules which say that any Government must provide extra money for extra pay, for increased prices or for demography. The fact is that this Government have and the previous Government did not.

I have also heard it said that the percentage of GDP spent on health care in other countries is higher than it is here. Indeed, so it is in countries that finance their health care either privately or through the insurance system. They have to count into their GDP on health care the costs of the people who send out bills and invoices, the people involved in credit control and the credit ratings of those who must pay for the service, and all the people who must chase up the poor souls who cannot pay. As long as we have a Health Service financed through taxation, the percentage of GDP is likely to be lower in this country. Long may it remain financed in that way. Does the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) wish to intervene now? No; he is busy writing his speech.

May I now turn to the specific topic of community care, in which I have a special interest, because there are eight hospitals in my constituency, of which seven are long-stay, dealing with mental illness, mental handicap and geriatrics.

It used to be the practice that Nottinghamshire dumped its long-stay patients in Derbyshire, particularly in south Derbyshire, and that Derbyshire dumped its long-stay patients in Nottinghamshire. I have a large number of constituents who are effectively rootless and completely cut off after many years in hospital from their communities. The regional health authorities plan to close most of those hospitals over the next 10 years and transfer the patients in one way or another to the communities around. All these hospitals have done excellent work over the past century. I single out Aston hall hospital and the Pastures hospital at Mickleover in Derby. Aston hall is blessed with £800,000 for a demonstration project to show the work that can be done with community care. It has got that money because it has a first-class record of moving people with dignity and compassion into the community and having them accepted in that community. I am glad to see that.

I have no doubt whatever that the staff, with the co-operation of local people, can ensure a smooth transition to more normal life styles for many of those patients and, perhaps even more important, for potential patients who might otherwise be obliged to go in. The health authorities' activities therefore have my full blessing. I shall do everything that I can to help them. Governments for many years have made the Cinderella groups of the elderly, the mentally handicapped and the mentally ill, a top priority. At least, that is what they have said. In the case of the elderly, I suspect that such a declaration has been almost unnecessary because the growth in numbers alone and the needs of the elderly have meant that they take up the bulk of the services. In the National Health Service, for example, they use about half of all the acute beds. We should recognise that this Government have consistently accepted the demographic imperative—if I may put it like that — and have made resources available.

As for the mentally handicapped, their status has improved dramatically over recent years. My right hon. and learned Friend will remember the battle of Amesbury road in Moseley in which I tried to construct an adult training centre for the mentally handicapped within a stone's throw of his house. The objections came, not from my right hon. and learned Friend but from one of his neighbours who was a surgeon at a local hospital. We managed to shame the man into accepting it. It was some years ago.

Even in 1970, mentally handicapped children were regarded as ineducable. Now, they are found all over the country in little units attached to normal schools and they are doing very well. I believe that once they, their families and their neighbours are used to their being in the community, that is where those children will tend to stay. Once this generation of mentally handicapped hospital patients has gone through the hospitals, I doubt if we shall ever again fill up the hospitals by "putting such people away".

The specific problems that I think we face and have not solved are those of the mentally ill. Mental illness is not a nice topic. It is not an easy topic to discuss. The main reactions that one gets in this area of work are ignorance, apathy, prejudice and hostility. I became aware of this problem of acceptance when I was chairman of the central Birmingham health authority. I was obliged to close a ward in the Queen Elizabeth hospital. It was a psychiatric ward, and it was on the top floor of the hospital and our patients started throwing themselves out of it. We eventually reopened it as an out-patients' department.

The first question that I asked was, "Why on earth did we put an acute psychiatric ward on the top floor of the hospital block in the first place?" The answer was that the professor of psychiatry had a battle royal to get psychiatric patients regarded by his own colleagues as ill, treatable, curable and appropriately placed in the teaching hospital, and therefore, the fifth floor ward which no one else wanted was the only one available.

Most psychiatry in the United Kingdom—the Select Committee saw this on its visits—does not take place in teaching hospitals; it does not take place in acute hospitals; it is not glamorous; there are vacancies for staff and very often the staff are untrained or undertrained. They are overworked, unsupported and unappreciated. That is a matter of fact.

What is missing is not so much resources. What is missing is not so much the Government commitment. What is missing is public understanding and the acceptance of mental illness. Just as the professor had no end of trouble persuading his colleagues in the medical profession to accept the presence of his patients in their hospital, so those of us who take an interest have a major task ahead of us persuading constituents and colleagues that the mentally ill are not different people to be segregated as if they have some disease that is catching. They are part of our community. Appropriate treatment, rehabilitation and research facilities are not an option but an absolute necessity.

Serving on the Select Committee on this topic was a depressing business in itself. The National Schizophrenia Fellowship presented us with many pages of evidence and I challenge anybody to read those case histories without feeling desperately sad. It is a heartbreaking business. The most noticeable feature of much of the evidence received was the anguish and bewilderment of many of the families, including families with the NHS in other contexts—such as those where the head of the household was a doctor —that there was no help available for such patients. They have found that, 40 years into the NHS, too often the attitude of public authorities consists of a mixture of stonewalling and buckpassing so that precious little progress can be made.

Mental illness is no respecter of persons. It is now just about three years since an hon. Member committed suicide. I hope that sufficient time has passed for us now to look at the matter a little objectively. Jocelyn Cadbury was my Member of Parliament. I was his senior councillor and twice running a member of the selection committee which invited him to fight the seat. I attended the inquest and we found that he had twice before tried to commit suicide. I do not think that it would have mattered very much if we had known because he had fought the illness successfully for 16 years and had no particular reason for feeling depressed. There was no reason, as far as we could discover, why he eventually succumbed.

I believe that, if Jocelyn Cadbury had suffered from a physical illness, he would readily have admitted it, sought help and expected to receive, and received, sympathy. Because it was a mental illness, he feared the stigma and was unable to ask for help in time.

We still have a desperately long way to go to change attitudes towards mental illness. The Government have shown themselves willing to face the expectations that we all put on the NHS. My right hon. and learned Friend has shown his capacity to follow public opinion and to lead it. I hope that he will take to heart the remarks of the Select Committee on this difficult area and continue his efforts to improve the care that we offer all of our people.

9.51 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): This is a timely and useful debate. I congratulate the Chair and membership of the Select Committee on producing a report which allows a debate such as this. Several of its observations are valuable and some of its recommendations should be taken up. As I am sponsored by the National Union of Public Employees, which has many members in the Health Service and local government, I must observe that they will be at the sharp end of any programme of continuing closure of large psychiatric institutions and the transfer of resources to borough councils.

As I was a borough councillor in Haringey, I am well aware of the enormous pressure on resources on a borough council's social services budget and the difficulty of arguing for sufficient funding for the mentally ill. Although I welcome the idea behind the Select Committee report and the work that it has put into the subject, we must remember that community care as many members of the Select Committee envisage it is extremely expensive. I am not convinced that the Government are prepared to put in the necessary sums of money. Nor am I convinced that they are prepared to lift restrictions on borough or county council expenditure to enable them to make provision for the mentally ill. I am alarmed that the Government are proposing community care on the cheap. That would entail grave dangers of privatisation, private homes and all that goes with them.

Many Conservative Members hold up for praise the great virtues of the north American health service. They often quote the alleged efficiencies of health care in the United States. Many studies have been done of the process which is known as deinstitutionalisation in the United States. They have found that deinstitutionalising the mentally ill and putting them into privately run and privately owned institutions does not guarantee their safety, a cure or help, but means that somebody makes a great deal of money. The motive is different: not to look after people but to make money out of them. The American Federation of Labour and Congress of Industrial Organisation conducted a survey on private care for the mentally ill and the concept of self-regulation. Its report said that self-regulation was "inadequate, unworkable and unacceptable as a substitute for strict government enforcement of standards."

Although Conservative Members praise the American system as an example of the unfettered, free market economy, they should remember that there is another side to the coin.

There is severe understaffing in the institutions which provide care for those who are mentally ill or who need psychiatric care and insufficient resources are made available. Vast needs are not met by the large institutions. The Minister for Health should tell us how much money the Government are prepared to put into community care. Inadequate resources are being provided. Community care is far more expensive than institutional care, so much more money will be needed to enable a smooth transfer to community care. In 1979, the Jay committee reported that the number of staff working with the mentally handicapped needed to be more than doubled to 60,000. The Government have not responded to that recommendation and the number of places has decreased. Guidelines for local authority residential provision for the mentally ill suggest 0·33 places per 1,000 of the population. The present provision is one third of that number. Although the provision is increasing in some areas, there is still a long way to go.

Those who are physically or mentally handicapped are cared for not only by institutions, the social services and the National Health Service but by a large number of people who are forced to give up their jobs to look after relatives who are ill. Although Conservative Members praise the concept of community care for relatives and neighbours, in many cases it forces women to give up promising careers. The reason is that inadequate funds are made available. The Labour party is determined that they should not be forced to give up their careers. It will ensure that adequate public resources are made available. I know many people whose careers have ended because they have had to look after mentally or physicall ill relatives. It is a very serious problem, and I am surprised that Conservative Members are smirking.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The hon. Gentleman said that the Labour party would provide more resources for the care of the mentally and physically ill. How would it provide help for those people?

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman has made a perfectly reasonable point. Financial remuneration could be provided for those who are forced to stay at home, and there could be more community nursing facilities and home helps. Nobody should be forced to give up a career simply because a relative is seriously ill. Nobody should be forced into financial hardship as a result.

There are many recommendations in the report. The principle of the financial atmosphere in which the report has been produced has to be examined. While some Conservative Members may choose as their bedtime reading Conservative Central Office or Department of Health and Social Security propaganda, the fact is that there is serious underfunding of the Health Service in general, serious underfunding of the social services and serious underpayment of many manual workers in the hospitals or social services departments.

The report refers to a serious problem in recommendation No. 55 — the relationship between the National Health Service and the local authorities. While the report is careful and specific in saying that there has to be a close relationship between the institutions in ensuring that community care is properly carried out and that individuals who are being looked after by the community are properly looked after and not put at risk, the report begs the question about the relationship between the Health Service and local government — with the democratic nature of local government and the essentially undemocratic and rather patronising nature of the Health Service structure.

In areas such as care for the mentally ill where there is a close overlap between the role of social services departments and that of the NHS, both institutions must be looked at again. I would favour bringing things closer to the local authority where there is a greater possibility of democratic control, or democratising the Health Service. The relationship between the two institutions must be brought closer together.

I should like to refer to several recommendations — [Interruption.] If Conservative Members cannot be bothered to listen, there are plenty of bars in the building that they can go to to continue their conversations.

The first recommendations to which I refer is where the report rightly refers to the high cost of community care. It states that it cannot be done on the cheap. If the Government pay lip service to the report, I hope that they will respect that recommendation and make the necessary financial provisions available.

The report also refers to individuals leaving mental institutions and making sure that an individual care plan is available for such people so that they are not lost in society or some plethora of so-called community support, but are genuinely looked after individually. That is extremely important.

Another important point concerns the need for a central bridging fund to ensure that sufficient money is available for the cost of closing psychiatric hospitals and the increased cost to the local authorities. Another particularly important recommendation, which shows that a great deal of work has been put into it, concerns the design of buildings for the mentally ill and the need for consultation on it. As one who has been involved in examining building design in the past, I believe that far too often architects' ideas tend to run away with them, as do local authorities, ideas. They do not take into sufficient account the needs of the people who will have to use the buildings.

There are social security problems for the residents in psychiatric institutions or mental hospitals. I hope that the Department is prepared to examine that seriously. Many relatives of people in mental hospitals have come to see me, who have been concerned about the way in which benefit payments are made to patients in those institutions and their understanding of the benefit payments to which they are entitled and which are being paid to them.

Recommendation No. 90 is about the disposal of sites after the closure of mental hospitals. People in my constituency are concerned about that. The regional health authority is proposing to close Friern Barnet hospital, which is in the Prime Minister's constituency. The Select Committee suggests that before such an institution is closed and the land or the buildings sold it must be offered for the maximum use of the service for which it was built. Many people are sceptical about the motive for closure and sale. They believe a lot of it is asset stripping and that sufficient funds are not being made available to the local authorities to undertake the necessary care for the psychiatrically ill.

I should like to make some specific points about the effect and thrust of the policy proposals on London from the DHSS. Virtually every social services department in London has been told by the Government that it is about 30 per cent. over the grant-related expenditure allocation formula. It must, therefore, be fairly obvious that if those social services departments are to have far greater responsibility for the mentally ill, they will require more resources.

I hope that the Minister will say tonight whether the GREA formulas will be adjusted to take account of the needs of those people who are to be cared for by the community, or whether the same punitive measures will be taken against those social services departments as have already been taken against eight London authorities through the rate-capping proposals last year. The operation of the resource allocation working party formula on Health Service expenditure means there is a continuing and long-term outflow of resources from inner city areas. Those of us who represent inner city areas are acutely aware of that every day. We are aware of the long-term plans for the closure of many hospitals and of the centralisation of health facilities in individual boroughs or health authority areas. I hope that the Minister will recognise that there has to be a serious change of attitude on this matter.

In my constituency, Islington borough council, as part of the local authority partnership agreement, is in discussion with the regional health authority and the Government about developing care in the community, and on the effects of the closure of the Friern Barnet institutions. At the present time, 300 Islington residents are patients at Friern Barnet. Of those, 100 are psycho-geriatrics, 100 need medium to long-stay accommodation and 30 are acute psychiatric cases. The local authority has put forward a detailed set of proposals on how those cases can be dealt with.

The real problem is whether there will be sufficient money available from the regional health authority to the local authority to meet the needs of those patients. It has not been made clear how much it will cost to care for a patient who is no longer in a mental institution but in some form of community institution. I know of no figures made available on this matter and, as I said earlier, the local authorities are still being penalised by the grant-related expenditure formula. The Government should come clean on this matter.

Many local authorities are in the same position as my own borough of Islington where a local institution is being closed. There will be an influx of mentally ill to that area, and enormous responsibility will fall on that social services department. If sufficient funds are not available, the effect will be further cuts in the social services received by other people or inadequate care for people leaving those mental institutions.

Many people are extremely worried and suspicious about the motives of the Government in promoting community care. They do not know whether it is to be a cost-cutting exercise or a genuine attempt to improve care for the mentally ill in our society. Exactly the same problem is faced by the neighbouring borough of Haringey where about 400 patients will be coming from Claybury Friern hospitals when they close. Exactly the same problems apply there about the operation of the GREA formula and the costings they have worked out for it.

Mental illness in society requires more discussion. A matter of importance that is completely missing from the report, which could perhaps be studied at further length by the Select Committee, is the causes of mental illness. Any cursory study will show that the incidence of mental illness is greater in areas of high stress, intense poverty and high unemployment, and if we return people to those communities we must be clear about what we are doing for them.

The growth in, and causes of, mental illness require serious research. It is not good enough simply to say, "We will do our best to look after the mentally ill." That is obviously the case, but we should also look at the causes of mental illness, its patterns and the possibilities of cure of the conditions and symptoms.

Many people who work in mental hospitals such as Friern Barnet and Claybury which are threatened with closure feel a sense of injustice and anger at what is happening. They have worked very hard for many years in those institutions often under-staffed and in very difficult conditions. They are doing jobs for which they are not paid enough, and quite often they have not received proper training because of the way in which those institutions have developed. Therefore, it does not seem fair that closure should be proposed when it is not clear what will happen to the staff. It is not clear what the staffing implications will be for the borough councils that will receive the patients from those hospitals, nor is it clear what will be the long-term future for those people.

We require from the Government sufficient funding to pay for genuine community care, not care on the cheap. We also require a public education programme so that people understand the causes of mental illness and have respect for those who suffer from it. The mentally ill should no longer be put at the back of the queue either in terms of resources within local authorities or resources within the Health Service. If that continues, the mentally ill will continue to be shoved to the back, as a result of which we forget about them and pretend that they do not exist, as has happened for far too long.

10.12 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I feel as if I am bringing up the rear before the House listens to the replies from the Front Bench.

I was not a member of the Select Committee that produced this commendable report on community care. However, it has been interesting, informative and educational to listen to the debate and, as it were, to have flesh put on the report. After all, this was a unanimous report, and hon. Members have tonight given their own views on various aspects of it.

As I have said, I take an interest in health matters, but in this case I represent a Scottish constituency in which this is an important issue. The two hospitals there—Craig Phadrig and Craig Dunain—are greatly affected by the thrust of the policy which the Select Committee has been examining.

The debate has been notable for its lack of partisan flavour, with the exception of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who in characteristic rumbustious fashion gave a spirited party political defence of the Government's spending programme and disciplines in relation to the Health Service. She seemed to antagonise several hon. Members in a quiet way, but I could not help but feel that with the recess approching we are about to implement our own form of care in the community. We are going to shut down this central institution and move Members round about the country back into the community. Perhaps the old adage is true that MPs are more effective and less like manure when they are not all piled up together in an odious group but when they are spread round the country and there is a chance that they might do some good.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I am sorry if I hurt the hon. Member's feelings by being critical of his party leader in his previous incarnation as Labour Minister of Health. I merely wish to put on record one or two facts. Would the hon. Gentleman admit, having heard me speak many times in social services debates, that I can be exceedingly critical of the Government when I feel like it?

Mr. Kennedy: If so, it is in exceedingly coded terms. It is usually well padded by glowing remarks about the Minister, his spending record and his general demeanour. In fact, everything he is going is good, but.

We are getting off the subject, but on the point about spending, it is interesting to look at the figures when my right hon. Friend was Minister for Health. During that time the NHS had the largest ever sustained, in real terms, growth pattern.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): He was a filthy Socialist.

Mr. Kennedy: I think he was practising some of the principles which still guide him in politics today. It has been agreed all round that the basic issue of concern is that of funding. It will come as no surprise to the Minister, speaking in the luxury of the Opposition Benches, when he hears me say that I am firmly in favour of more funding for community care.

There are some fairly cruel contradictions or some dilemmas for local authorities in this policy. They have been encouraged to enter into joint funding agreements. They now find that, because of another arm of Government policy, namely, rate capping, they are faced with the dilemma of perhaps having to maintain the statutory financial obligations, particularly as the taper effects begin to move the burden for joint funded projects away from central Government and back to the local authority. As they have to consider how they meet the challenges or the obligations, it is likely that they will fall foul of Government policies in other sectors.

I think the Minister, being reasonable, would agree that dilemmas are presented for health authorities and local authorities. The point made by several speakers on bridging finance is particularly pertinent in that context. The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) quoted the Minister as saying that if some hospital facility has been greatly under funded and the function is transferred to community care the cost will go up. That is without doubt the case. There is no doubt that bridging finance and real pump priming are extremely important and additional pump priming is also important to make this whole shift in the balance and in the nature of care more effective and less crippling financially to local authorities than it has been or will yet be.

I should like to move to the role and position of the support services within the community. One of the commendable features about the report is the scope and the breadth with which it adopts its examination of the subject matter. There are two areas of particular concern. I mentioned the hospitals in my own constituency, but I am sure this applies to every Member who is in the Chamber. One is housing and one is transport. The Committee has done a good job in pointing to the need for more housing. It is right to look to the housing associations in particular as leading the way in the development of more housing geared specifically, certainly sympathetically, towards the needs of those with various forms of disability or handicap. That is welcome, and will obviously feed in well to a care in the community programme.

Some of us in the alliance have been spending a considerable amount of time in Wales recently. It made me laugh to hear everybody say what a big constituency Brecon and Radnor is. It is about 1,000 sq miles, whereas my constituency is 2,000 sq miles and involves several islands as well as the coast-to-coast mainland in the north of Scotland. Therefore, transport is close to our hearts. I was glad to see that the committee spent some time concentrating on transport. It said:

> "Desperately little attention would seem to have been paid to the effects on transport services of community care policies."

Everything should be done to examine that problem, particularly in the rural areas with scatttered populations. With the exception of the Western Isles and Orkney and Shetland, I could claim the constituency with the most scattered population. Not only is public transport essential in such areas, but the car is not a luxury but a necessity as well. Anything that can be done to focus on transport and its place in the community care policy is welcome.

The report is extremely interesting and points the way to the future when it recommends that > "voluntary bodies be approached with the idea of piloting service-contracting."

That is just one aspect. There is an immense potential for the voluntary sector to be harnessed still more. I appreciate the anxieties of the hon Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). That need not mean that one is trying to offload on to the voluntary sector, much of whose work is unrecognised and unsupported, what should be the rightful duty of the state or the local authority. However, voluntary bodies have an enormous amount of good will and ability, and can make a big contribution to the community, as the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) made clear from his local example. The voluntary sector could and should be more involved.

Sometimes, the various statutory and professional groups tend to approach the so-called Cinderella services somewhat hesitantly. They do not wish to involve voluntary bodies too much because it might lead to additional difficulties. I appreciate that there may be problems with professionalism, but much more can be done.

If I am lucky, I may learn more about the role of the voluntary and informal carer at Social Services questions next Tuesday. Assuming that the supplementary questions are somewhat shorter than the speeches that have been made tonight, we may reach my question. I shall be asking the Secretary of State whether he has any intention of introducing a specific carer's benefit which, if it were introduced, would go a long way to overcoming the problems that we have been discussing.

More can be done to encourage the local benefits office, the local housing office, the local social services departments and the local health authority to try to come together. This does not necessarily involve extra finance. We should try to provide some help for the person caring for the lady next door or the young couple keeping an eye on the mother-in-law or the elderly or dependent parent, uncle aunt or whatever. They should have a central point of access from which they can get more information about how they tap what is often the mystifying range of benefits that should be available to them but which they do not pick up. It could also tell them how some of the services, both statutory and voluntary, can be delivered in a more organised, cost-effective and professional way. Money could even be saved.

The report is generally welcome. I learnt a great deal from it and from tonight's debate. We can only hope that, after the publication of the report and tonight's debate, these ideas will circulate further, and stimulate more discussion and response. Whatever our differences in degree or on policy issues, we would all agree that this sector will become increasingly important as we go into the next century. I congratulate the Committee, and I look forward to the Minister's speech.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): It is normal to pay tribute to those who served on the Select Committee, and in particular to the Chairman of that Committee. Sometimes the compliments are nominal, but hon. Members throughout the House will agree that my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) has made a significant contribution over the years to the development of decent policies for health, social services and social security. The report is yet another of her contributions, and we look forward to many more.

We must pay tribute those who work in the old-fashioned, clapped-out, long-stay hospitals. They are usually overworked, underpaid, unappreciated and frequently unrecognised. Any criticism of those institutions is levelled, not at them, but at society in general, because we have allowed those institutions to fall into disrepair. We have not provided sufficient funds for the encouragement necessary for those workers to do their job properly. A major characteristic of the old institutions is that the people working in them are frequently out of sight and out of mind. That suits society. Most people agree that properly funded and organised care in the community is better for most people than care provided by the old institutions. Subject to a number of reservations expressed by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) and others, we all look forward to the day when most people are cared for outside institutions.

Before we can care properly in the community, we must ask why people were first cared for in the old institutions. We have all been shocked by spectacular mistakes. Some people should never have been housed in institutions, but once they were there they were not allowed out. Primarily, people were put in long-stay institutions because they could not cope outside on their own or because those who tried to look after them could not cope. Any change in the arrangements for people in those institutions must ensure that they can cope outside and that the people looking after them can cope with the problems. If we proceed willy nilly to move people out of the old institutions, those involved will not be able to cope. The danger is that we shall empty the old institutions and do nothing more. That will not be satisfactory.

To be realistic, we must accept that there is no evidence that "the community" cares. It has never cared much about people in institutions. We must ensure caring for the future, but that will not just happen. We must create the machinery. People living in the community now — people who are vaguely living and vaguely in the community—are not being cared for. For example, we do not know how many homeless people live in London. Estimates vary from 5,000 to 20,000. At least several thousand people are homeless in London. Many of them have medical problems. Many are addicts of one sort or another. Many suffer from physical or mental illnesses. "The community" has left them to doss down wherever they can, leaving the police to move them on, when they want only to settle down for the night. If the Government and society want to prove that they have the capacity to provide care in the community for people who are at present in institutions, the best way to carry conviction is to do something about the people who are not being looked after properly in the community now.

To cater for those concerned we shall have to provide many smaller units, some of which will have to give the full-time care — 24 hours a day, 52 weeks a year — which the old institutions have provided, but in a smaller and better environment. We shall need better places where people can go for shorter stays. We must make provision for day care and outpatient care. There will have to be a massive increase in domiciliary visiting, with improvements in primary care of all kinds. From most available evidence, it is clear that we shall have to provide much more training for general practitioners in mental health and mental handicap, which is not their forte at present. We shall need a vast structure of support for families, neighbours and friends, by whom a large part of the burden of community care will be carried.

In my view, a warm-hearted instinct has produced the revolution in thinking about the problems of the mentally handicapped and mentally ill, but we must be practical and ask whether the resources to sustain the development of a high standard of care in the community are being provided. From an examination of the present position, or from a reading of the Select Committee's report, the answer is that the resources are not being made available to make care in the community work as well as it should.

Almost everybody agrees that the old institutions should go and that we need new units, but there is not much evidence that they are now being built on a sufficient scale. There is little evidence that sufficient additional day care units are being provided in places convenient to people living in the community. There has been some improvement in outpatient psychiatric treatment, but much remains to be done on that front, and we need much more training for doctors and others. I could give a litany of requirements, but if I did the answer would probably be, "No," "Not very much," "Not likely" or "Not on your life." We must change that situation.

In view of the resources that are being provided, it seems that the Government have not appreciated the scale on which they will be needed. In a speech to the Richmond Fellowship in July last year, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, in my prescence, said:

"It may be the case that care in the community will be more expensive than care in the large institutions."

There is no question but that it will be more expensive if good quality care is to be provided. The old institutions are being phased out because they do not provide care to a high enough standard. If we provide care to a higher standard, wherever we provide it, it is bound to cost more.

The old institutions provide bulk care, and the best parallel of which I can think is an old motor coach. It carries large numbers of people, it has not had enough spent on it over the years and it needs to be replaced. The only alternative that would be cheaper than the old, clapped-out motor coach would be for everybody to get out and walk, because no alternative provision has been made. If the old coach is replaced by small or individual forms of transport, that will cost more in total than squeezing everybody into the big old coach. So it is with new provision that will need to be made for care in the community. If we are talking in terms of individualised, tailor-made care for everybody who comes out, that is bound to be more expensive than the old institutions.

I find it difficult to obtain evidence that the additional resources will be provided. On 8 December 1983 I asked the Secretary of State for his estimate "for the current year and each of the next two years of the increased costs to local authorities of providing care in the community for people spending less time in acute hospital beds, the closure of convalescent homes, and homes for the elderly, the mentally-sick, the mentally-handicapped and disabled persons."

The Under-Secretary of State replied at some length, ending with the following:

"the information needed to make the requested estimates is not available centrally."—[Official Report, 8 December 1983; Vol. 50, c. 233-34.]

I asked a further question on roughly the same lines on 16 July 1984. The question was directed to the number of people involved, and not finance. Again, the Department did not have estimates of the number likely to be moved out. In October 1984 I asked the Secretary of State what increase in joint finance allocations to certain London health districts he estimated would be required to promote the closure of old long-stay institutions and the development of community care. The Under-Secretary replied:

"No such estimates have been made centrally."—[Official Report, 23 October 1984; Vol. 65, c.573.]

As I understand the British system of government, it is not possible to get money from the Treasury unless Estimates are produced. A Government who are not producing Estimates on the cost of community care are clearly not seriously into the business of getting the necessary funding. Underfunding will have two effects. First, it will bring the concept of care in the community into disrepute. Much worse than that,if community care is practised on the cheap, there will be disaster for those who need the care and also for the unofficial, unpaid carers —in other words, family, friends and neighbours—who take on the great burden of looking after those who come out of the institutions. We all know that the bulk of the burden will be borne by women. Unless we make adequate provision, a great burden will fall on many women who are not equipped to carry out that task of caring. Being born a woman does not necessarily provide the full equipment to look after a member of the family who is physically or mentally sick, despite our traditions.

Even if the additional resources are provided, many women will carry out the task because women have always done so in the past. I suspect that everyone present in the Chamber knows families where an amazing amount of love—there is no other word for it—is poured into looking after a mentally ill, mentally handicapped or physically ill relative. When I come across that in my constituency, I feel humble. That is my feeling when I come into contact with families who treasure one of their number in that way. It can be a terrible burden, and it is our duty in planning care in the community to ensure that the community does not consist of one family or even one person. Genuine care in the community means us all getting together and sustaining the carers as well as the cared for.

Members of the Select Committee will know that one of the greatest reliefs for a family that is caring for one of its number is respite care, when the person being cared for can go into a hospital while the rest of the family have a holiday. I am not saying that I have come across an example of that respite provision being withdrawn for the mentally handicapped or the mentally ill, but within my constituency I have encountered examples of the withdrawal of respite care for the physically handicapped because Stoke Mandeville hospital, which had formerly provided respite care, could no longer afford to do so.

Local authorities have a statutory duty to provide for the mentally ill, but they are allowed to make their own assessment of the level of need. The latest figures that I have been able to find show that, of the 32 London boroughs, seven provide no special accommodation and seven others provide no day care places for the mentally ill. They cannot claim that there is no need, because nearly all 14 place people in facilities which are provided either by other boroughs or by voluntary organisations. Even in what the Minister regards as relatively well resourced London, local authority provision is lacking.

The problems are shown by the figures on after-care for patients discharged from mental hospitals. I have not been able to obtain any national figures, but the latest figures for Greater London show that only 3 per cent. of the people discharged into inner London had definite arrangements made with their local social services to provide some care for them when they came out of hospital. That is a staggeringly low figure, yet these are the very local authorities which have been rate capped, which have already lost a gigantic amount of rate support grant and which can expect to lose even more when the arrangements are announced next week.

The Government will claim—I am sure that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) will back them—that spending on social services has risen by more than 12 per cent. in real terms during the Conservative party's term in office. By subtracting the increases in spending which have been made by those councils which the Government vilify as prolifigate overspenders, we can see that there has been practically no increase. Many local authorities have scarcely increased their spending.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) referred to the relationship between poverty, a poor environment and the incidence of mental ill health and mental handicap. I think that every one accepts that there are social, class and income relationships. That means that, as the big old institutions are closed down, people will be discharged to the poorest parts of Britain, especially to our big cities. On the whole, the health authorities most likely to be affected by the discharges are those which, under the changes of the past few years which were so proudly introduced by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), lost most funds and suffered most cuts. The four Thames authorities which serve Greater London are the most significant.

In October 1984 I asked the Secretary of State whether "the resource 'allocation working party formula for capital allocations reflected the cost of replacing large long-stay institutions in outer London as part of the move to community care."

The Minister replied:

"No. The RAWP formula does not specifically take account of the cost of replacing obsolete buildings."—[Official Report, 23 October 1984; Vol. 65, c. 572-73.]

In other words, this magic formula which certain people think is so fine does not make any allowance for the need for inner London health authorities to provide new buildings to replace the old institutions in which the mentally ill, mentally handicapped and old are housed. I suspect that the effect is similar in other large cities.

Successive Governments have failed to find the resources necessary to bring about care in the community. "Care in the community" has a potent political appeal. It breaks down the concentration of care, as represented by the hospitals, and redistributes it over a much wider area. This redistribution does not solve the problem, but from the Treasury's point of view it has inestimable value in that it makes the problem harder to identify and consequently easier to ignore. One reason why the Government are so keen to mouth phrases about care in the community is that it allows them to adopt an attitude of "Out of the NHS accounts and out of mind". It is more difficult to identify the amount being spent in the regions through agencies, local authorities and voluntary organisations, than it is to make a simple check on the spending figures of a centraliesed National Health Service.

The old institutions will be with us for some time, even those that are gradually being emptied. One of our duties is to remain aware of how these institutions are functioning. It is generally accepted that institutions which are being run down find it extremely difficult to provide even their previous standard of service. There is a fall in morale among the staff and an awareness of the running down, which makes things difficult. We must ensure that the people still in the institutions do not suffer even more than they did in the past as a result of the run down.

I have written to every district health authority about attitudes to privatisation and the contracting out of ancillary services. The most significant response was anxiety that privatisation might spell danger for people in long-stay institutions. Many of the district health authorities replied that the domestic staff, especially in long-stay institutions make an essential contribution to life in the wards. They are able to spend time with patients and get to know them. They become familiar with the patients and the patients familiar with them. They will make cups of tea in their spare time and help old men fasten their flies when they come back from the lavatory. That is a contribution towards humanising the wards.

The health authorities are aware of the danger that once the clipboard and stopwatch approach is applied to domestic services on the wards that high standard of care will either disappear or nurses presently occupied with other duties will have to provide it. If that happens, more nurses will have to be appointed or some of the existing functions will not be carried out.

The Opposition strongly support the idea of care in the community, but we do not believe that any of the big old hospitals should be closed before people in the hospital and in the area that it serves and those who wish to provide care in the neighbourhood are satisfied that satisfactory alternative provision has been established. My experience suggests—this applies not just to mentally handicapped people—that some of the people who have been moved out of the big old lodging houses into homes of their own or group flats have suffered in the process because insufficient provision was made in advance to support them during that transition.

Mr. Corbyn: As there is declining provision of acute hospital beds in inner and city areas, and a great demand for geriatric, psychogeriatric and psychiatric provision, the long-term problem is often longer waiting lists of people trying to get acute beds because there is insufficient overall provision.

Mr. Dobson: I accept that, although I suspect that the Minister will not agree, and I shall deal with that aspect in a moment.

We should accept that the disappearance of the old institutions in any geographical area must not take place unless we are satisfied that adequate provision has been made in advance for those to be transferred. The important point is that it should be made in advance. If people are not caught by proper after-care arrangements from the moment they leave the old institutions, they will be lost to the system and will never by retrieved. It will be almost impossible to track them down and many people will actually die as a result of being moved out of the old institutions. For those who have been in institutions for a long time, the trauma of coming out will be the worst part of the process and we must look after them very carefully during the transitional period.

Many genuine mistakes are also likely to occur during the transitional period. It is vital that the people organising these things do not take an ideological view about moving people from one part of the spectrum of care to the next. They should not regard themselves as having failed if the part of the spectrum which they most favour turns out to be unsuitable for some of the people for whom it has been provided. Everyone involved must keep an open mind, or we may end up expecting some people to function in facilities which are still too institutional for them, while demanding that others survive in a non-institutional climate with which they cannot cope. If the Victorians did not have the moral right to put everyone in big institutions, no more have we the moral right to put people in any particular part of the new spectrum of arrangements if it does not suit their needs.

I do not believe that proper care for the people moved out into the community can or will be provided by people making money out of it. That has been one of the major thrusts of the Government's policy on care in the community, but we do not believe that the standards laid down are adequate or that health authorities have the resources or the will to do the necessary monitoring. When, predictably enough, the profiteering became too obvious even for the present Government, their response was not to step up control of standards and to distinguish between good and bad providers, but to introduce new lower limits on DHSS support, which has hit high quality voluntary and charitable provision as well as the profiteers who were allegedly the target.

In view of the time, I shall not take up any more of the points raised in the debate. I make just one final point, which no doubt will not commend itself to the Conservatives. I do not believe that care in the community can really work in a society based on he stressful and competitive philosophy of the modern Tory party. The Government believe that the engine of society is selfishness and competition, that life is a race in which the prizes not ony do but should go to the strongest, the fastest, the cleaverest and the most aggressive. That view is ultimately irreconcilable with the idea of looking after the mentally handicapped and the mentally ill.

The Victorians, who, as we all know, subscribed to the values which the Prime Minister claims to like, resolved the dilemma by taking the mentally and physically handicapped out of the race altogether and putting them in large institutions, partly to cocoon them from the struggle. People with handicaps cannot be cocooned in the same way in the community if the community is based on competition. Besides the requirements for proper care in the community which have been outlined by hon. Members on both sides of the House, there is one overwhelming requirement—to base our society on a recognition of our mutual dependence and our obligations one to another. That is not the Government's philosophy, but without that philosophy characterising our entire society, care in the community will never prosper.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was his usual quiet and attentive self for most of the debate, but he perked up a little and his beard began to bristle when my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) began to inject some of the red meat of partisan politics into the debate. When he replied, he carried with me for most of the time as he made a reasoned and considered speech, but he ended with one of his slightly over-the-top pieces of party philosophy, which took him a little away from the subject.

I wish to begin—I hope that I shall end in more or less the same mood—by agreeing with as many of the hon. Gentleman's sentiments as I can. I join him in congratulating the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) and all the members of the Select Committee on the work that they put into producing this report. I agree with most of those who have spoken in the debate, including the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, that we should support the policy of care in the community, which the Select Committee report carefully defines, to make sure that we do not start using it as a slogan. I am especially glad that the Select Committee members managed to secure a debate on the report, so that we have had a protracted discussion on an extremely important subject. I have come to believe that this is an extremely important part of current health policy. It is also the part of health policy that is least understood by many members of the public, and it still arouses much unnecessary controversy when authorities attempt to put it into practice.

When I became Minister for Health, I knew a fair amount about the care in the community policy, but I had little direct experience of the problems of putting it into practice. When I came to my present job, I shared some of the public's scepticism about some of the things that had happened in the past. I was certainly sceptical about some of the consequences of the so-called upgrading of mental hospitals which began more than a decade ago, which led to patients being turned onto the streets, because they were described as non-treatable, to reduce the numbers in the wards. Not long ago, I visited a Salvation Army hostel where the people there told me that they remembered ambulances coming up outside the hostel and turning out patients who had just been declared to be non-treatable by a psychiatrist at a nearby large mental hospital.

I knew when I started, and still know, that mistakes can be made. I know that people discharged from hospital can lose touch with the services that are meant to support them and can fall sometimes into sad and unpleasant conditions. I always have a fear that we should not add to the population living under the railway arches at Charing Cross and elsewhere by finding that, accidentally, we put discharged mental patients into that position.

However, having said that, and being aware of all those problems, I must say that, after only three and a half years in the job, I have become an enthusiast for the policy which underlies this changeover to care in the community. That is because I have seen good examples of what is happening as health authorities tackle the changeover that is required.

For instance, I have seen the enthusiasm, as my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) said, with which the leaders of the health authorities and the local authorities in that part of the country are making the change, and how they are collaborating to achieve it. My hon. Friend praised his health authority, and most hon. Members who have visited Exeter will agree with him that it has done much in this area. In other parts of the country, I have made a point of trying to see care in the community policies and have asked health authorities to show me what they have achieved. I have met patients of all ages and the staff who care for them, and I have heard first-hand descriptions of improvements in the quality of patients' lives that are being achieved now. I do not wish to generalise too much from the examples of individuals whom I have met, but I shall cite two which relate to long-stay patients who might be thought difficult to transfer out of an institution. In Eastbourne, I met a mentally handicapped man who I should say was in his 60s. He had spent 40 years in a nearby hospital for the mentally handicapped. For about 30 years of that time he had been mute and a disruptive patient—not seriously, but setting off fire alarms and fire appliances in the hospital. I met him in a converted couple of houses where he lived. He talked pleasantly in a relaxed way. He described his life in Eastbourne and was plainly enjoying it. He was clearly not highly intelligent, because he was mentally handicapped. He was able to talk and was enjoying a much fuller life than he had for all those years in his hospital.

In Derby I met a man who had been diagnosed as mentally ill. He had spent 40 years in a nearby large mental hospital. I met him living in a converted terrace house with a great deal of close support from the local social services department and the housing association which had provided the housing. He was slightly reticent, but he was not an unusual man. If I had met him outside the house I should never have realised that he had been a patient in a mental hospital. The only curious thing about his conversation was that his recollections of Derby all revolved around the second world war when he had worked making aircraft engines in the nearby Rolls-Royce factory. He had plainly been cut off from ordinary life in Derby from the second world war until a year previously, when he had gone into that new accommodation. I mention those cases, firstly, because it is always encouraging to meet such improvements being achieved in patients' lives, and, secondly, because they led me to the conclusion to which the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) came. I agree with him that one goes to one part of the country and finds that there are many patients whose transfer into the community is regarded as impossible and yet one goes to the next place and finds that that has been achieved successfully.

There is plainly no way in which we can discharge all the acute mentally ill patients into the community, but with mentally handicapped patients the position is rather different. I do not see a future for large ward and large hospital care for them at all. A great deal can be achieved. It is easy to exaggerate the difficulties of moving long-stay patients into the community.

I do not just have the experience of this country. I attended a meeting recently of Ministers of Health from all the countries in the Council of Europe. I heard them all agree that a community-based model of care should replace an institution-based model. All those countries were adopting policies similar to ours. I am glad to say that in such an international gathering the United Kingdom is seen as something of a pioneer. That relates not just to this Government but previous Governments. We were also regarded as having avoided so far some of the worst dangers of going too fast in an ill-considered way, as I fear has happened in Italy, or scarcely moving at all, as appears to be the case in Greece.

Despite the mistakes and the difficulties, by and large the process of change has been reasonably well managed here.

It is rather unfortunate that the Select Committee went to the United States and that it cites the United States and Italy as the international comparisons because—with no disrespect to the general health care in those countries—they are widely regarded as two of the poorest examples, with especially unfortunate mistakes having been made in Italy. I do not think they resemble anything that has happened here.

We should realise that we are achieving a great deal and that we are in line with international practice. I hope that the few hon. Members, such as the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who say that many people suspect that the change is just part of saving money, realise that they are out of step with the majority of Members of the House who realise that our objectives are shared by the vast majority of those genuinely interested in the mentally ill and mentally handicapped patients.

We must restate the aims of the policy to a sceptical public. We ought all to agree about the need to change from an old-fashioned and unsatisfactory pattern of care in which most of the patients were unwilling long-stay patients in large wards in large hospitals. We must replace that with better, more civilised and humane care for patients that keeps them in closer touch with the community and allows them to live in their own homes or near centres of population.

We need smaller units of all kinds, including small hospital units, with nursing staff trained in community skills. We need sheltered housing with resident staff. We need day services and domiciliary help for family carers, to whom the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) paid tribute, and for those patients who are capable of self-sufficiency in their own homes.

In my visits around the country, I have seen remarkable cases of severely disabled people living alone in their own house or living in twos or threes. With the right support, people who the average layman would think could not possibly cope are living in their own homes. That is the objective of the policy. It ought not to be controversial.

I cannot emphasise too often that the Government are not changing the pattern of care to make cuts or to save money. That is not our objective and it would be a mistake for anyone to think that it is a credible objective. We are shifting resources with the patients. We will have to retrain and prepare staff. Sometimes it will cost more on balance and sometimes it will cost less.

I quite agree that, in changing to a more modern and humane pattern of care, we must concentrate on the needs of patients. Each patient will require individual assessment of needs. The transition for each patient, as well as for whole blocks of the service, will require careful joint planning, joint approaches from health and local authorities and co-operation between all the health care professions. It is a pity that, in just one or two speeches today, hints of rivalry between the professions began to creep in. There were suggestions about which authority might dominate in the provision of care and which unions or professions might get the bulk of the staff and provide care.

I agree with the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye that it is important to take advantage of voluntary bodies and what they can contribute. Care must be provided by those who are best able to provide it. That might be the health authority, the local authority or a well-run voluntary body. We must not discriminate between the three, but decide in patients' interests which of those bodies will get the finance and deliver the service.

Our aim is to improve the quality of life of the patients in our care. We want to improve their environment. We must put them in a less frustrating setting than large wards, give them more stimulus and less boredom, protect them and retain the best elements of the word "asylum". That policy has the backing, as I am sure the Select Committee found, of most of the leading interested voluntary bodies.

MENCAP and MIND—the largest bodies with an interest in mental handicap and mental illness respectively—are fully committed to this approach. I try to keep in touch with both as frequently as possible. The only criticisms that I get from them are that we are not going fast enough. They also always argue about finance. The Select Committee report endorses that policy and praises what has been achieved in some places.

I must say, however, that I find the report a little like the curate's egg. Although I welcome its support for its less institutionalised approach, if I am allowed to criticise the members of the Committee, who have fairly criticised the Government in various ways, I must say that the report lays heavy emphasis on the difficulties, having described its support for the policy. The report shows signs of having been influenced by many complaints, and on one or two occasions it proposes some curious arrangements. The Select Committee has paid far too much attention to those who say that it cannot happen until larger additional resources are made available to a particular witness's department in his locality.

The report acknowledges that sometimes excuses are made, but in each locality community care has got to be made to work, sometimes against the grain of local prejudices and by changing local practices, within realistic expectations of resources. The state priorities of the local authorities and the regional health authorities match those of the Government and of successive Governments on health care and social policy. Those priorities are the former so-called Cinderella services for the elderly, the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped.

One should find that, when increased resources are made available, generally they go to the priority areas. One is considering the activities of statutory bodies whose spending has increased briskly during the last six years. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South reminded us of the figures. The spending of those authorities which provide hospital and community health services has increased by 15 per cent. over and above the general level of inflation during the last five years, and the spending of the social services committees of local authorities has increased by 17 per cent. over and above the general level of inflation in the same period. As they are spending so much money, they should pay more than lip service to the priority services. That is where the bulk of the money should be going. We give growth money to the health authorities to enable them to make changes in practice and meet rising demand.

Whenever a debate is held either about finance or about policy in the National Health Service, the Government are able to point to the vastly increased amounts of money that are given generally to the authorities, which we leave them to disburse, and to the policy priorities. The debate is then turned round on the Government. We are asked: if those are the priorities, where is the extra money? The point of providing more money for the coffers of the health authorities is to enable them to improve their services in the stated priority areas.

Given that we are not devoid of resources for this priority area, one looks at the pace of change, upon which the report placed much more emphasis than any of the speeches to which we have listened today. The Select Committee's report urges a substantial slow down in the pace of change. It suggests that any idiot could close a large hospital. If so, during the last few decades we have been rather short of successful idiots. No authority has ever succeeded in carrying out its stated intention of closing a large hospital. This is not a new idea, anyway. The report refers to the 1962 hospital plan when the Minister of Health became quite lyrical about the need to close down large numbers of mental hospitals. Twenty-three years later, not a single large mental hospital has been closed. Therefore, I cannot agree with the emphasis that the Select Committee has placed upon the Government avoiding undue haste.

Although the aim of the policy is not to close hospitals —that in itself is a pointless aim— nevertheless it is worth considering whether we can replace some of these institutions with something better. Most regions have one or two hospitals that they ought to have closed many years ago. I fear that some of them are a disgrace to a modern, civilised country. They are very old, and since the hospital plan was published they have become older, more expensive and emptier. The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) described his experiences of visiting some of our larger mental hospitals. I have been as moved as he was by some of the conditions that one sees there. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras described some of them as clapped out. Some are dank, inhospitable dumps as buildings. I agree that the amazing thing is that the quality of care has been raised so much by the dedication of all the staff wo have to work in those inhospitable surroundings. I join the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras in paying tribute to the staff who have done so.

One has to ask: why have many of those hospitals, long earmarked for closure, never closed? One of the main problems is the difficulty of planning the replacement services and making sure that thy are there for the patients to move out. There have been other reasons as well. We all know that there have been if we have local experience of trying to plan that change. Once the closure of a large hospital is proposed it is usual to encounter resistance to that proposal from friends of the patients and the staff. Friends and relatives tend to fear any change from a setting that they may think is not attractive, but where the problems of the patient appear to be relieved to some extent.

Whatever the Confederation of Health Service Employees say nationally—it is in favour of the policy generally — locally, trade union leaders and large numbers of the staff tend to resist the loss of jobs. The local population often receive an inadequate explation of what is likely to replace the hospital, so they are induced to campaign against the closure, which is presented to them by the National Union of Public Employees or other unions as all part of a policy of health cuts. That slows down the changes and adds to the difficulty of making them.

No doubt the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), who has joined us, if we ever succeeded in closing the large mental hospitals, would add the lost beds to the ludicrous figures that he produces to try to show that bed closures are a measure of the state of the Health Service. That all underlines the difficulties that are faced in practice in closing large hospitals. I have my own experience. Saxondale hospital was cited by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East. It was first mooted for closure when the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) was the Minister responsible for health. We still have not got round to it. Most local people will believe it when it happens and will accept it once they are satisfied that better services will replace the hospital.

Mrs. Renée Short: Does the Minister accept that during our inquiry we did not have representations from any hospital union, from either individual workers or groups that we met, complaining about the possible loss of jobs if large mental institutions were closed? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman put that out of his argument? We said in our report that after the closure of the large institutions staff would be deployed, working with smaller groups of patients in different circumstances and different settings, but the jobs would still be there.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for making that point. It is the same point that I made. I have encountered leaflets issued by local union branches trying to organise resistance to a closure on the grounds of resisting health cuts and saving jobs. I accept that the hon. Lady may not have encountered that, but I have done so, not least in my part of the country.

We therefore have decided to set early dates — we have already set some — for the closure of those redundant hospitals. The reason for setting dates is that that will provoke the start of the serious planning process, and where that process is well advanced, it will concentrate people's minds on maintaining a set timetable in implementing it. Provoking the planning process sets in train a difficult series of measures that the authorities have to handle if mistakes are not to be made or kept to a minimum. Those involved need to explain to relatives that by the date set better care will be provided. They need to explain to the staff the retraining that they will require and their future in the system, as the hon. Lady said. They need to explain to the local population the type of patients who will move into the community and avoid planning rows and unreasonable fears. I am tempted to defend my neighbours against the attack of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South; but I am glad to say that there were no objections in the part of the world that she described. Objections can be avoided if the nature of the movement into the community that is taking place is explained to the population.

We must provide better services outside before anyone is transferred. Everyone is agreed upon that. Every patient must be individually assessed and moved to a setting that suits his or her personal situation. That is an extremely difficult process, but it is important for the Government to keep up the pressure to make sure that people concentrate their minds on it and accept it is going to be necessary to do those things, because the large hospital is finally going to be closed. I do not regret the pressure we are putting on to make everything proceed.

Not all hospital care will be replaced. Many of those suffering from mental illness will need some hospital care. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), who said that there is a slight danger, if one is not careful, that people will concentrate on community care, which is easily arranged for the mildly neurotic, and forget that the first call upon the hospital service must be, in the case of mental illness, to care for the seriously disturbed and acutely ill patient. From time to time schizophrenics certainly may need hospital care.

For the future, the small local unit on the district general hospital site is the best model. A few months ago I attended the opening—not the formal opening, but very nearly the actual opening—of one in the Queen's medical centre in Nottingham. There I met staff members who were extremely enthusiastic about what they were going to do, and they were nurses transferring from Saxondale. they could see they were moving into a better hospital environment. We also need hospital hostels; small homely units.

We must guard against hospital units being provided which are merely transferring patients from one hospital institution to another. It I had time, I would answer the complaints made about Oxford. I will go away and find out again about the situation in Barnsley about which I have heard complaints before, and try to make sure that hospital authorities are not going to reproduce institutions.

These things are going on at the moment. It is good practice and it is working up and down the country. It is being assessed and spread by the Health Advisory Service, Good Practice in Mental Health, the National Development Team for Mentally Handicapped People, and Kent Community Care Project Assessments. Those are various groups which know an great deal about what has been achieved already and are disseminating good ideas to those who are getting started.

Having tried to persuade all those who have spoken, except for the hon. Member for Islington, North, who insisted on carping about community care, that the objectives are common objectives, I will turn to the matter of finance, because the other message for the Select Committee is that we will support this policy with more enthusiasm so long as we are satisfied that the finance is going to be there to provide better services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East said that he did not believe this was going to be a cost-neutral policy. I am not sure why it is believed that cost-neutral is really the basis upon which the change is being made. In our detailed evidence to the Social Services Committee on Public Expenditure, we showed that expenditure has increased in real terms on the mental illness and mental handicap services. Spending by health and local authorities on these services rose by 19 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1983-84. Unit costs have risen more substantially, and in this area I accept that unit costs can be taken as reflecting rising standards where previously one had low-cost hospital facilities.

The figures now no longer reflect the total resources employed in the care of these groups because they are going over increasingly to general community health services expenditure and the amount going on mental illness and mental health cannot be precisely identified. But there is more money going to this area all the time and that is not cost-neutral expenditure. When it comes to transferring the hospital to community, one cannot always tell whether one is going to spend more in that locality or less. I will not go in great detail into the engaging description by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras of the old coach being replaced.

Before assuming that it is automatically more expensive outside for the great majority of patients, I ask hon. Members to remember that about 40 per cent. of the expenditure in a large hospital is not in direct patient care. That percentage is the cost of the maintenance of the buildings and support services and so on. If the ratio of one to one staff attention required in the community is going to be greater, a certain amount of money which may have been wasted on old fabric, will be released to finance personal care.

Mr. Norris: Given that 40 per cent. of the cost of institutional care is not directly related to patients, surely the relevant point is that bridging finance is not merely the provision of capital to buy small houses before the receipt from the old institution. It must also take account of the fact that diminishing numbers in a large institution will still have to be catered for while adequate services are provided in the community, and that will be a substantially longer bridging operation which will have a substantial ramp on both sides.

Mr. Clarke: The bridging argument entered my exchanges with the Select Committee and is again reflected in the report. I accept that in the loosest sense of the term, bridging must look at the capital and revenue needs. We need a mechanism that can cope with that.

I know that the Select Committee feels strongly about this, and I should like to explain what the regions are now doing about it. The role of the regions is to allocate resources to the change in policy. The purpose in allocating resources should be to enable the health authorities to close down the institutions, disperse the patients and to buy the service required for those patients from whichever area is best. One must therefore decide how much money will be transferred with each patient.

In a sense, that will be a patient's entitlement to cover care in the community. One will have to decide how much money will be transferred to another district health authority, if that is where the patient comes from; to a local authority, if its social services department is to provide the care; or to a voluntary body, such as MIND. That will enable those organisations to buy the service required.

As far as I can see, all regional health authorities are now beginning to build up their own arrangements for precisely that mechanism of transferring funds in order to buy the services that patients require. I do not have time to describe what each and every region has done, but the hon. Member for Leeds, West cited the example of the £14,000 per place being given to MIND.

The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) criticised the amount being contemplated by the north-west region. That region appears to have an extremely good system of transferring funds with the patient, and it will pay a local authority, such as Manchester city, for providing services. At the moment, it is paying £11,300 for each patient, because that is the average cost incurred. That may not be right, and the average cost may not be sufficient for a heavily-dependent patient. What is needed — I believe that the north-west region will look at this with the local authorities — is a more sophisticated mechanism for deciding how much each patient will cost in each place.

That much is already being done by regions. If we have a central bridging fund, and given that the Government will build it up presumably by putting money into it out of the total Health Service allocation, one is really saying that centrally we shall try to achieve this bridging over and above what the regions are already doing. I am not sure whether that is desirable.

I did not close my mind about that, and I do not do so now. For the last three or more years since I have been Minister, I have been saying that I would look at any cast iron proposal that demonstrated that bridging finance was required for capital or revenue. But that must be a well thought-out scheme requiring genuine bridging finance where money was needed up front to complete the closure of an institution. That would release the funds which would pick up the finance in the future, thereby enabling central finance to go down.

I more or less told the Select Committee and others that by some means or other we would find the finance for such a well-presented scheme. No such scheme has ever been presented to the Government, and no locality is cited by the Select Committee where such a proposal is thought to be necessary or possible.

I shall look at any such proposal to see whether the claim is justified or excessive, but it is important that the central contribution should fall away at the end just as it builds up at the front. I shall also see why the present regional mechanisms are not coping with this, although I believe that most regional health authorities would claim that they could cope over the strategic planning period. I do not reject the idea outright.

I remain to be persuaded that a worthwhile use for such a scheme is likely to be forthcoming. I have not left myself time to deal with all the other finance we are providing: the huge increase in the funds going to joint finance; the opportunity we have taken to enable care-in-the community money to be transferred timelessly to local authorities; our initiative on getting mentally handicapped children out of hospital, a matter on which I feel as strongly as the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter. We must complete the job on which there has been a great deal of achievement over the last three years.

I remain enthusiastic about care in the community. I trust that the Select Committee will propagate the policy, point out its advantage to the public, campaign for it with enthusiasm and combine that with their criticism and their scepticism. I think we will all find that we will make worthwhile advances on behalf of the patients in our hospitals.

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, the Question was deferred, pursuant to Order [4 July].

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the deferred Questions and the other Questions necessary to dispose of the remaining Estimates appointed for consideration this day.

CLASS VII, VOTE 1

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £1,151,288,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of the Environment on subsidies, the option mortgage scheme, improvements and investment, grants to housing associations and the Housing Corporation and sundry other housing services.

CLASS VII, VOTE 2

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £19,505,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of the Environment on housing administration, including rent officers, rent assessment panels, and grant in aid to the Housing Corporation; housing management and mobility; grants to voluntary organisations concerned with the homeless; and contributions towards the work of the National Federation of Housing Associations.

CLASS VIII, VOTE 2

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £86,176,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of the Environment on other environmental services including grants in aid and international subscriptions, on grants in aid to the British Waterways Board and Development Commission, on bridgeworks and on developing Civil Defence water services, and a contribution to the Lord Mayor of Bradford's Appeal Fund.

CLASS VIII, VOTE 3

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £176,464,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of the Environment on derelict land reclamation, the urban programme and grants in aid for Urban Development Corporations.

CLASS VIII, VOTE 5

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £86,300,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of the Environment on central administration, including royal commissions, committees etc.; payments in connection with licence fees and environmental research and surveys including housing, building and civil engineering research.

CLASS XIV, VOTE 1

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £367,125,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure (partly recoverable), including loans by the Property Services Agency of the Department of the Environment on acquisitions, public building work and accommodation services, etc., for civil purposes in the United Kingdom.

CLASS XI, VOTE 1

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £5,168,144,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Security on the provision of services under the national health service in England, on other health services including a grant in aid and on certain other services including research and services for the disabled.

[Mr. Clarke]

Housing (West Lewisham)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mather.]

11.32 pm

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to my hon. Friend the Minister for keeping you up late to discuss certain aspects of the housing problems in West Lewisham. My hon. Friend understands how important they are. From a previous incarnation as a Lambeth councillor, he will understand many of the problems in Lewisham. It is a fairly typical inner London borough which combines the leafy suburbs of the south with serious problems of urban decay and deprivation in the north. A lot of the housing is old, certainly pre-war, built in the 1930s, some of it in the 1940s and quite a lot of it even before 1919. We also have problems with multi-occupation estates and high-rise blocks built in the 1960s.

In the time available, I should like to look at the capital housing budget for the borough. The basic HIP allocation for Lewisham has fallen from £29 million in 1980-81 to just over £20 million this year—a fall in real terms of about a half. If one looks at the total capital spending, which includes receipts from sales and one or two other balancing items, one finds a similar picture. It has fallen from £32 million in 1980-81 to £30 million last year and £21·6 million this year—a fall of more than 50 per cent. over five years and of nearly one third from last year to this year.

The aspect to which I ask my hon. Friend to address himself is the biggest problem presented by the capital repairs and improvements needing to be done to many council properties in the 1960 estates and pre-war houses. Reductions in the budget have meant that those essential works are not being done. To some extent, the position has been ameliorated by the proceeds from the sale of council houses. They contributed £5 million to Lewisham's capital expenditure last year, but this year the contribution will be only about £2 million, despite the fact that the council has about £8 million in the bank from sales in previous years.

There is no question but that Lewisham council has dragged is feet over the right to buy and has not been an enthusiastic seller. It is also fair to say that much of its remaining stock will not be sold without some inmaginative new initiatives on the part of the Government rather than on the part of the council and that the restrictions on being able to spend 20 per cent of those proceeds will remove what little incentive there is to a council like Lewisham to sell its properties.

I should like to spend a few minutes on the question of essential repair and improvement work that is not being done. The council in Lewisham owns about 43,000 houses and has sold about 2,000. I think that it would be fair to accept that for the foreseeable future it will remain a major landlord. It is therefore incumbent on it to keep its housing stock at a reasonable standard. It is in duty bound, surely, to protect the value of public assets by maintaining those values, to maximise its income from them and to reduce the number of difficult-to-let properties which arise, not always but sometimes, through a lack of capital expenditure. Essential work on both capital repairs and rehabilitation is being postponed. Roofs needing replacement or renewal, houses that have not been rewired for 50 years, and concrete cladding that is crumbling on tower blocks are all examples of capital repairs that need to be done. Rehabilitation accounts for some of the empty properties. More importantly, some of the environmental improvements to an estate can make it easier to let and maximise its income and can encourage people to buy their flats.

There are revenue consequences to these capital savings. The capital expenditure reductions appear to be a saving, but often the result of not doing a capital repair is that current repairs have to be done. If the roof is not replaced, it has to be patch repaired, perhaps once a year, until the capital repair is done. That costs money, and on top of that is the inescapable fact that if a capital repair is not done this year it will cost more to do it next year, and if it is postponed next year it will cost more to do it the year after. There are some false economies in what appears to be happening.

All of this also militates against the desire of tenants to buy their own property, because they are less likely to do so if the capital repairs that should be done are not being done. If they are asked to buy places that are in a bad condition, they are unlikely to do so, whereas if their estate has environmental improvements, or housing that has been brought up to standard, they are more likely to buy.

Lewisham has many houses that were built in the 1930s and 1940s, and many 1960s estates. A proper repair and improvement programme would maintain the value, maximise the income and facilitate sales of such estates.

In the owner-occupied sector, the picture on improvement grants is not encouraging. Although in this year's capital expenditure there is a provision of about £2 million for improvement grants, it was committed last year. Since then, 3,000 applications for discretionary grants have been turned down. The Government and their supporters rightly pride themselves on the enormous advance in the home improvement programme, but it is worth bearing in mind that one of the consequences of the Budget is that there will not be a single new discretionary grant this year.

The problem is even worse on some of the transferred GLC estates, because of the repairs that need doing to those and the consequences of the HIP allocation for the GLC. Lewisham compulsorily took on 13,400 GLC properties, one of the largest numbers. It did not want to do so, but it got them under a statutory instrument that was passed by the Government. It contained a repair and improvement guarantee by the GLC to put those properties at a certain standard by 1992.

The boroughs that took those properties did so without surveys, but relying on the guarantee, which was a major and vital element in the transfer. It is clear that the base of the financial arrangements for making the transfer was to be that no undue disadvantage should fall on the ratepayers or the tenants of the borough that was taking the properties. Surely it was implicit in the imposition of a guarantee such as the one imposed on the GLC by that statutory instrument that the GLC would financially be able to fulfil that commitment.

The GLC's renovation strategy for its properties identifies £1,000 million worth of work in the next seven years—about £140 million a year. This year, the GLC's HIP allocation is £67 million, and in Lewisham one can see the results of this in a repair programme that is clearly behind schedule. The stock that was taken over in Lewisham was worse than the average GLC stock. Urgent repair and health and safety work is being postponed.

Worse than that, some of the costs that should be falling on the GLC are falling on the borough's HIP allocation, because it has had to do emergency programme repairs that are not being done by the GLC. This year, the GLC will spend about £6 million on capital improvements in the borough, whereas it is clear that the figure needs to be nearer £12 million if that programme of improvements is to be fulfilled, and the guarantee redeemed by 1992.

Of the 1,605 GLC properties transferred to Lewisham in my constituency, 470 are on the Sydenham Hill estate. It is a well-situated estate in a nice area, is well landscaped and looks good from the outside. Five or six years ago, if one had asked the tenants what they thought of it, they would have said that it was a pretty nice place in which to live and work. However, as a result of the way that the estate was built in the 1960s, almost all of the flats inside are miserably cold and damp in the winter.

People are living in cold, and unattractive conditions. Outside the crumbling cladding is dangerous for people walking below it. The GLC consultants identified £4 million worth of capital repairs that needed to be done to the concrete, heating, window frames and so on. The proposal for this year's spending is about £1·8 million—nearly half the sum.

In fact, the GLC will spend £100,000 on repairing the concrete and £75,000 on the heating, and the Lewisham council will make up the spending with another £200,000 which will enable central heating to be installed in 138 —or just over a quarter—of the units. That is a total of £375,000 against £4 million worth of work which needs to be done.

Not only will tenants continue to suffer and have to put up with their cold, damp flats for another winter, but it will affect the possibility of selling the flats, the let-ability and the income to be derived from them. It will also affect revenue expenditure. In the long term, it will cost more to install central heating, to renew the windows and to deal with the falling concrete in two or three years' time when conditions are worse.

Tenants are worried about what will happen after the abolition of the GLC. We are told that the GLC's HIP allocation will be divided between the boroughs, but it is not yet clear upon what basis. It would be unfair to divide it on the basis of the general needs index, which is how the London HIP allocation is generally divided. Lewisham took nearly 10 per cent. of the GLC houses stock when it took 13,500, whereas Sutton took none. It would be unfair if Sutton received part of the GLC's HIP allocation.

The fair way is for the GLC's HIP allocation, whatever it is, to be allocated to those boroughs which took GLC stock specifically earmarked to fulfil the GLC's commitment. The current GLC HIP allocation will not be enough, however it is divided, to redeem that commitment to put the properties into a proper condition by 1992.

How will the residuary body's ability to generate capital be utilised? Will it have the power to utilise capital receipts to repair the properties by 1992? Will it be able to enter the equivalent of the GLC's HIP allocation, or will those capital receipts not be able to redeem that promise?

Capital spending on housing in Lewisham has fallen by 50 per cent. in real terms in the past five years. A major result is the postponement of major work. That has affected sales, let-ability, repair costs and the income from properties. Repairs will cost more in the future.

The GLC has special problems. The HIP allocation is not sufficient to redeem the promise made in the statutory instrument to put properties in a proper condition. Considerable problems might emerge from the abolition of the GLC and the reallocation of HIP money to the boroughs.

I cannot help concluding that once again current overruns have resulted in capital cuts. That is a false equation. The potponement of essential work is a false economy and will cost more.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) for giving us the opportunity to discuss housing in West Lewisham. I know from correspondence how deep is his interest in housing. He has rightly raised a number of issues about his constituents, not least about the arrangements after the GLC is abolished on 1 April next year. This evening my hon. Friend gave a perceptive analysis of some of the issues, and I should like to respond to some of his anxieties.

I shall comment first on the general level of capital spending and the provision that we have made for capital expenditure by local authorities, which in the current year will be over £4 billion, a considerable sum by any standards. I need not re-emphasise to my hon. Friend the importance of the Government keeping within their overall figures, which are central to the Government's economic strategy. If expenditure were allowed to rise significantly above the level that I have outlined, pressure would be put on interest rates and there would be the risk of growth and investment in the private sector being impeded. In the long run nobody would be advantaged if there were any interruption to the recovery.

Within the figures, the initial housing investment programme allocations made to local authorities for the current year amounted to almost £1·6 billion, and London's share was almost £483 million. In addition to the initial housing investment programme allocations made for this year, those authorities which complied with our request for voluntary restraint on expenditure in 1984-85 are eligible for 5 per cent. supplementary allocations. On top of that, authorities facing particular difficulties because of the implications of the Housing Defects Act have been invited to make bids for supplementary allocations.

As my hon. Friend said, Lewisham's allocation for the current year is £20·3 million. It has made no application to us in connection with the Housing Defects Act, but it could be entitled to a 5 per cent. supplementary allocation when the final figures for 1984-85 are known. As my hon. Friend pointed out, Lewisham can supplement its HIP allocation through the use of the prescribed proportion of capital receipts. While this year we have had to reduce it to 20 per cent. generally, it is still possible for authorities to augment their allocations in that way by significant amounts.

There has been some misunderstanding about what that reduction has meant. I hope my hon. Friend recognises that we have not deprived local authorities of their capital receipts. We have simply spread the use of such receipts over a longer period.

Within the overall system, local authorities are free to determine their own capital programmes in accordance with local needs and priorities. Lewisham must, therefore, determine its 1985-86 programme in that way. I do not deny that the reduction in the prescribed proportion, and the allocation that Lewisham has, means that the council must take some difficult decisions about priorities. However, those are decisions which Lewisham is better able to take than are the Government.

One must move away from the idea that throwing public money at Lewisham's problems will solve the issues to which my hon. Friend referred. He displayed a keen interest in the idea of getting private sector finance to make faster progress in tackling the problems that he described, and any private finance is additional to the council's allocation.

The council can sell empty properties, either improved or unimproved, and it can initiate low-cost home ownership schemes. If existing council tenants are given access to such schemes, rented housing is then released for those who need it. My Department's urban housing renewal unit, which I shall describe more fully, will be happy to help.

It is crucial that Lewisham manages its stock properly. At the end of March 1984, Lewisham's rent arrears, of almost £6·75 million, represented 21 per cent. of the total rent collectable. In the last few years, not only has the council not increased its rents in line with increases recommended by the Department to take account of inflation, but it has not made any rent increases at all since 1982-83, although I understand that it has recently given notice that there will be a small increase from August. That means that the local authority has been denied resources of which other authorities in London have availed themselves.

From the point of view of other indicators of management competence, on 1 April 1984 Lewisham reported that of the 42,000 council-owned dwellings, 7,000 were difficult to let and 2,123 were empty, of which 637 had been empty for more than a year. I see in his place my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moymihan), who, I know, has serious reservations about the competence of Lewisham's housing department.

The number of empty properties—5 per cent. of the total stock—must be a source of concern, as is the number of properties empty for more than a year. Recently, my Department issued a circular to all local authorities giving detailed guidance on measures to reduce the numbers of their empty dwellings, and I hope that my hon. Friends will use what influence they have with the local authority to persuade it to adopt some of those initiatives. There has been a substantial increase over the previous year of properties in Lewisham which are difficult to let. The total now represents about one sixth of all the council-owned stock in the borough.

The Government are concerned about the growing number of difficult-to-manage estates in Lewisham and throughout the country. We are worried about rising rent arrears and the number of council houses standing empty. For that reason we have established recently within the Department the urban housing renewal unit to help local authorities tackle rundown estates. The problems of these estates are becoming increasingly varied and intractable and the unit, by drawing on the experience and expertise of local authorities, the housing services advisory unit, the priority estates projects and consultants, will be able to offer expert, independent and individual assessments of local authorities' difficult estates. The unit will be able also to suggest a package of measures to deal with them and seek to encourage a variety of different approaches, including disposals to the private sector and locally based estate management initiatives.

We have already made an approach to Lewisham suggesting a meeting with the unit. I hope that my hon. Friends will be able to persuade the council to respond positively and to put aside any political dogma in the interests of making real progress with the tenants whose interests both my hon. Friends represent. The unit will help the authorities to maximise private funding opportunities. In addition, it will be able to influence the direction of public sector resources where this proves to be necessary.

The figures that I have outlined of Lewisham's 42,000 stock show that 1,550 units were unfit, that 5,260 while fit lacked basic amenities and that 865 had amenities but needed renovation. This is serious. To get more detailed information on the condition of the housing stock generally and the expenditure that it is necessary to put it into good condition, my Department has written to all housing authorities. Lewisham has been unable to supply complete estimates, but the council has provided some useful information which we are processing along with information from other authorities. At a national level, this information will enable us to get a better understanding of the resources that are needed to tackle the renovation problem and will inform the continuing discussions about the public infrastructure. These discussions are taking place within the forum of the National Economic Development Council.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West mentioned improvement grants and the policy adopted by Lewisham council. Local authorities are able to approve discretionary grants in such circumstances as they think fit. They have complete discretion in these matters. They can decide whether to make grants and, if they do so decide, at what rate they should be. At one time we understood that Lewisham was thinking of making no new discretionary grants in the current year. That would be regrettable, because, of almost 50,000 privately owned dwellings in the borough, over 5,000 are unfit, over 1,000 are fit but lack basic amenities and almost 11,000 are in need of renovation. I understand that the council has decided recently to introduce a small discretionary grant programme for special cases where, for example, there is financial hardship. Applications are now being received from disabled residents.

I take up my hon. Friend's remarks about the transferred stock and the position that will arise after 1 April 1986. He referred to the housing that was transferred from the GLC to Lewisham council, which comprised 13,415 units, and the arrangements for renovating these properties after the GLC's abolition. I understand his concern and the concern of those who live in the blocks. There has been a good deal of propaganda from the GLC and its friends implying that the GLC's programme to renovate this stock will not continue after abolition.

Much of the propaganda has drawn a veil over the GLC's track record. My hon. Friend will know that his constituents on the Sydenham Hill estate are alarmed about the poor housing conditions there. The Government's contention is that the boroughs, as the primary housing authorities in London, will be better able to carry through this programme of repairs successfully. Much of this alarmist talk fails to recognise the arrangements that we are to introduce to allow the boroughs to renovate this stock when they inherit this responsibility on abolition.

My hon. Friend referred to some guarantees. I am not sure who gave the guarantees to the tenants of the GLC transferred stock. The Government made it clear that they could not underwrite any GLC commitment to bring the stock to a satisfactory condition by 1992. We have made it clear that the GLC's housing investment programme allocation would be allocated to the boroughs after abolition. The resources will not be lost to London. London's entire housing capital allocation will be distributed among the boroughs, including the share which would otherwise have been given to the GLC.

My hon. Friend suggested that some of the allocations should be earmarked, and my Department is considering this. We have already asked Lewisham and other boroughs to make a bid for 1986-87 which will reflect the responsibilities which they will inherit from the GLC. The distribution of the allocations will take account of the expenditure liabilities. It is also our intention that virtually all the prescribed proportion of housing capital receipts will be distributed in proportion to the housing capital allocations including the receipts associated with the mortgage account.

It may be that the London Residuary Body, which will be responsible for the GLC's mortgage account, will be able to unlock further resources to London by re-financing ex-GLC mortgages. There will be no net loss of resources to London as a result of abolition. The boroughs will have the advantage of receiving those resources directly and accordingly will be able to manage their own programmes according to their own priorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West spoke mainly about capital. We do not intend that the boroughs should suffer the loss of the revenue assistance which they currently receive from the GLC on the transferred stock. We will ensure that the broad financial effect of these payments is maintained after abolition by adjustment to Lewisham council's entitlement to rate support grant.

These arrangements will cover the obligatory payments currently made by the GLC and will take account of the revenue consequences of future renovation works to transferred stock which would otherwise have fallen to the GLC. It is important to recognise that these arrangements will apply irrespective of authorities' current spending position in relation to their grant-related expenditure assessment or their targets—should we continue to have targets.

I hope my hon. Friend will see that the housing investment programme allocations and the changes made to the capital receipts rules for 1985-86 were essential to ensure that capital spending did not exceed the public expenditure plans and that the level of public sector borrowing was kept on track. In the longer term, we are looking again at the system and at possible improvements. We would like to achieve a better match between our duty to control the overall level of capital spending and borrowing in the national economy and the need at local level for a firm basis for future planning. Consultations with the local authorities have already started.

Within the constraints on resources, the best use must be made of what is available. We are improving our knowledge of the condition of local authority housing stock and the need for expenditure on it. The recently issued advice on empty dwellings and the establishment of the urban housing renewal unit are positive steps forward as are our proposals for a new approach to home improvement, which were outlined in a recent Green Paper.

My hon. Friend has argued forcefully in support of Lewisham's housing investment programme submission for 1986-87. The council's bid should be with my Department shortly and officials will meet representatives of the council — probably in the early autumn — to discuss the submission in detail. Before the allocation for 1986-87 is made, we shall give very careful consideration to everything that Lewisham council has to tell us and anything that my hon. Friends have to say. Full weight will be given to all the points that have been made tonight, including the need for continuing investment on the former GLC estates. I hope that my hon. Friends the Members for Lewisham, West and for Lewisham, East will use what influence they have to persuade Lewisham council to broaden its horizon and to look at some of the innovative solutions which are already being adopted by other London authorities.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 12 July 1985

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

House of Commons (Services)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

9.35 am

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The House is indebted to the Chairman of the Accommodation and Administration and Library Sub-Committees, the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), and the Chairman of the Computer Sub-Committee, the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam), for the reports that their Committees have prepared and laid before the House.

The fact that the debate arises on the Adjournment will permit a wide-ranging consideration of the issues relating to the work of Parliament and will enable the Services Committee to take account of the views expressed in considering how best to take forward what has been proposed.

I begin with a general observation about the costs of Parliament; it is to those costs that certain of the proposals will have to be related. I say that because Parliament in the main is not cash-limited in its budget and therefore there is need for conscious self-restraint.

The House might wish to reflect on the fact that, for the four years 1981-82 to 1984-85, total identified costs for the Houses of Parliament, excluding MPs' and peers' pay and allowances, rose from £35 million to over £48 million, a rise in cash terms of 35 per cent. In the same period, Members' salaries rose by 23 per cent. and Members' allowances from £10·2 million to £15·9 million, a rise of 50 per cent. Overall, the costs of Parliament, including pay and allowances, rose in cash terms by 38 per cent. in those four years. That was against public spending generally in cash terms having risen by between 25 and 27 per cent. Thus, it is not a question of parliamentary squalor amid public affluence. It is a formidable demonstration of the rising costs of this place.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Does that include the costs, including travelling expenses, of Select Committees?

Mr. Biffen: It includes certain aspects of the costs of certain Committees. The compliance cost of Select Committees on Government Departments is not included in the figure and, if it could be assessed, I suspect that it would drive the figures even higher.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): To put it in perspective, what was the equivalent cost of living increase over that time? That will show the extent of the real increase.

Mr. Biffen: I shall have that figure by the end of the debate. The real comparison is the rise in the costs of Parliament relative to the rise in public expenditure more generally.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Can my right hon. Friend identify, among the compliance costs, the cost of answering parliamentary questions?

Mr. Biffen: I had not briefed myself on that fascinating point. The rise in the number of questions has not been all that dramatic in the recent past. Nevertheless, that is a factor in the rise in costs. That there has been a rise is undeniable, but I think sometimes that if, overall, the rise in the number of parliamentary questions—I say this in the presence of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—is modest, at least he has done his best to see that it is on a rising trend.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The cost is decreased if the questions are answered truthfully. There are two types of question—very costly requests for statistics, and questions on matters of policy. Most of my questions have been policy questions, which means that Ministers actually need to use their brains to answer them, rather than extremely expensive statistical questions. If and when I ask for statistics, I ask for them to be given if they are conveniently available.

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that it would be helpful to get into the more metaphysical aspects of parliamentary questions, but the hon. Gentleman makes a wholly valid distinction. The House will have to consider whether the facilities increasingly available through the Library POLIS arrangements can replace much of what would otherwise be available through Government Departments as a possible means of making savings.

I had no idea that my casual, tentative, almost anodyne observations about the cost of Parliament would release so much passion so early in the debate. In view of the pattern of rising costs, it behoves us all the more to be vigilant, especially as the future development of the Bridge street site is likely to have a considerable impact on the costs of Parliament.

The report of the Computer Sub-Committee on Members' requirements for information technology recommends a computer system for Members' use to provide word processing facilities, an electronic mail system and access information services such as Ceefax, Oracle and the Library POLIS system. The system would be phased in over four years and would necessitate recabling throughout the Palace and the outbuildings. In the final phase, the annunciator system, which will also require recabling, would be added to the new cabling network. The Sub-Committee acknowledged in paragraph 84 that those two reasons for recabling were related by proposing the integration of a new annunciator system into the local area network. The first phase of implementing the Sub-Committee's recommendations would include a pilot project involving 36 Members to see how the facilities might be used.

At a time when we are still at the planning stage of the new parliamentary building, it is particularly helpful that the Sub-Committee has identified the possible information needs of Members. Some Members feel that the development of parliamentary outbuildings should be used so that the Palace itself is primarily reserved for Members and staff are accommodated elsewhere. In those circumstances, a Member's ability to communicate quickly and easily with his staff located in another building will be especially important. I note that the recommendation in the report would facilitate that communication and I am sure that many Members will show great interest in that.

The other dimension to the development of the Bridge street site is financial. In approving the Third report from the Services Committee in 1982-83 on phase 1 of the new parliamentary building, the House committed the Government to substantial capital expenditure. At present, although we may estimate the costs of this, we cannot be sure. I suspect that our estimate will be too low and that unforeseen expenses will arise. We therefore need to be cautious about committing ourselves further financially.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it would be criminal not to build in at this stage all the foreseeable developments required for the next few years rather than having to put them in at infinitely greater expense a few years after the new building is completed?

Mr. Biffen: The use of the word "criminal" shows the exaggerated emotion attending this subject. I am concerned to put before the House the challenges contained in the report by the Sub-Committee. The timing of these matters is vital and must be related to the plans of the Department of the Environment and the Property Services Agency for the building work and the rewiring of the annunciator system. To put in a whole range of sophisticated equipment ahead of time in the hope of achieving cost savings in a fast-moving area of development runs the risk of the equipment becoming obsolete in a very short time. I am not taking one view or the other. I am simply saying that Members must treat this subject with as much care, caution and prudence as if their own money were at stake.

We also cannot look at the costs of implementing these recommendations by comparison with future expenditure alone. Here I must sound two notes of caution. The first concerns the place of the annunciator system within the scheme proposed by the Sub-Committee. I understand that the present annuciator system is within five years of the end of its natural life and that installing a replacement system would mean recabling the whole Palace. In planning the recabling, it clearly behoves us to take into account the prospect of installing computer terminals in Members' offices and to choose the cabling and layout accordingly.

That does not mean, however, that we need to install the computers themselves as the recabling is carried out. Provided that the capacity is there, we can build the computer facility into the system at a later stage. Indeed, I very much hope that the next development will be discussions between the Services Committee and the Department of the Environment. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment will be keen to see what common interest can be established in developing a new wiring system both to serve the next generation of annunciators and to provide terminals for the provision of a computer system able to respond to Members' needs.

My second point in this connection also concerns costs. The total cost of implementing the report's recommendations is estimated at slightly over £5 million, but that figure does not include costs which cannot be accurately gauged at present. Those unquantified costs include the building work associated with the recabling. Given the nature of the Palace and the need to protect the fabric of the building, Members will appreciate that these may well be substantial.

I conclude my remarks on the report of the Computer Sub-Committee in a spirit of gratitude for its work, matched by a belief that its proposals must now be tested against available financial resources.

In the report on research assistants and the growing demand that they make on the facilities of the House, the right hon. Member for Deptford expressed the concern that the number of passes issued to Members' staff had risen by 23 per cent. in the past 10 years to a total of 1,061 in May 1984. That concern prompted the investigation and led to the recommendations in the report. The report recommends that no more than 150 passes per calendar year and no more than 50 at any one time should be issued to temporary researchers from overseas who will be here for less than four months. Otherwise, temporary research assistant passes should be issued only if the Member undertakes that the individual in question will be employed for more than four months. Those who do not qualify in either of those categories should be issued with a temporary secretary pass and should no longer be able to use the branch Library either in person or by telephone.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that many temporary assistants and researchers are unpaid or low paid? Does he further agree that hon. Members have many more than are necessary but, if they had proper secretarial and research allowances, there would be a reduction in the number of such unpaid and low-paid assistants?

Mr. Biffen: It is attractive to make the proposition that yet more allowances for Members of Parliament would result in fewer research assistants. Many of the research assistants who come within that category are brought here for other reasons and I suspect that, even with greater allowances, the problem would remain. I note what the hon. Lady says and I look forward to hearing her speech, but I have a feeling that what she said could engage the comments of the right hon. Member for Deptford, who has looked into this matter a great deal more deeply than I have. I must admit that I am somewhat cynical about the supposition that increasing allowances would result in a diminution in the number of low-paid or unpaid research assistants.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the present system means that hon. Members with other financial resources can get much of the work that they need done without reliance on facilities and employees here? Does he agree that the system therefore discriminates according to the income of hon. Members, which is unfair? Does he agree that, if British education institutions regularly and routinely supplied people as part of their course, we should not need students from overseas? As long as those overseas students come free and British people cannot afford to work for nothing, we are bound to look for assistance where we can get it without having to cough up for it.

Mr. Biffen: I am reasonably relaxed about all this, but it is not my report. I knew the House of Commons before we were flooded with research assistants, and Governments had a rougher, tougher time then. The idea that, to do our job, we must be buttressed by a growing army of well-paid or unpaid research assistants is just one of the current fashions. There may be many arguments about how we might have to add to the facilities for Members of Parliament and I am happy to hear the debate, but we are discussing a report prepared by the right hon. Member for Deptford and his colleagues and I suggest that we should proceed in that context. I am listening in a spirit of good nature, but I am not bowled over by the proposition that the good work of the House rests on an amplitude of research assistants.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): When, on 3 June, the right hon. Gentleman replied to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), who suggested that all hon. Members should have one research assistant who should be paid, he said:

"My hon. Friend makes an interesting point, but perhaps it would be better elaborated in the debate that has been promised on the second report of the Services Committee, dealing with research assistants."—[Official Report, 3 June 1985; Vol. 80, c. 17.]

Since that is this debate, will the right hon. Gentleman now elaborate on whether he agrees with his hon. Friend?

Mr. Biffen: No. I am anxious to hear my hon. Friend elaborate a sentence into a speech. When I have had the advantage of that, perhaps I shall be able to reflect the better.

Although adopting these recommendations would check the growth in the number of temporary researchers from overseas, it would have little effect on other groups. The report does not attempt to interfere with an hon. Member's right to engage staff. That is understandable, as there is nothing new in Members being assisted by researchers and no such restriction has previously been thought necessary. In the light of the arguments that have preceded the debate, however, I feel that the recommendations do not entirely allay the anxiety about the number of staff employed by individual Members.

The pressure on the Library and other facilities could be lightened significantly only if more restrictive controls on the number of staff were accepted by the House. We have had some suggestions about how that might be done. As the debate proceeds, the House will be able to judge the whole issue and whether it merits further consideration. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Deptford will be marking concern on this matter and I strongly hope that his Sub-Committee will consider any anxieties that are expressed today. Suggestions for a further restriction could proceed only when there have been widespread considerations by the appropriate Sub-Committee of the Services Committee and when the House is clearly sympathetic to any recommendations it makes.

The main theme of the debate is the desire of hon. Members to use efficiently the resources at our disposal to serve constituents. Both reports deal with how that might be achieved, though in different ways. The report of the Computer Sub-Committee suggests means by which information can be more readily accessible to hon. Members and communicated more efficiently. The report on research assistants exposes the problems that can arise from the pressure which their conscientiousness can put on finite facilities. The questions that it raises and the solutions that may be proposed deserve our further attention, and I have no doubt that we shall return to them. Meanwhile, I hope that the House will have a constructive and informative debate.

9.56 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I also thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) and the members of their Committees for the work that they put in to prepare these reports.

There are already too many ill-informed critics who are eager to denigrate the House of Commons by overstating its cost to the community, and it might have been better if the Leader of the House had quoted the real costs rather than the inflated costs in regard to the past five years. Inflation accounts for probably half of the increase that the right hon. Gentleman announced. The right hon. Gentleman's experiment—Select Committees—which I welcome, as they have been a success, account for part of the 38 per cent. increase. The increased cost imposed by the average hon. Member in the past five years is therefore fairly modest.

I was fascinated to note that the right hon. Gentleman, who is usually so urbane and controlled, managed his only moment of passion when he harked back to the good old days of his parliamentary youth. I am sure that we all want to accommodate a more up-to-date attitude. What the two studies reveal goes far beyond their remit. They reveal the three areas of inadequacy that we have all come to expect — inadequacy of accommodation, inadequacy of staff facility and resource and the almost non-existent support facility.

The Leader of the House mentioned the 23 per cent. increase in passes for members of staff. As the report states, our discussions are trammelled by the fact that we shall not have much more accommodation before 1990. Therefore, we must consider the present accommodation in the Palace of Westminster. We all recognise the pressure that our present problems have put on the Library, the photocopiers and even the catering facilities in the House.

However, most anxiety has been expressed about the short-term overseas interns, as they are described. I do not believe that the House has faced the problem that the increase in such research assistants reveals. Does it disguise a real need for more resources, as I believe is the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), and is it a cheap way of avoiding a resolution of the real problem by using ill-equipped amateurs, insead of professional researchers, to provide information? We have ignored the question of how we should allocate, among Members, this marginal accretion of our research resources. Many hon. Members may not want overseas students to help them. I would rank myself among those, because I am too lazy to discipline myself to make proper use of them.

While those extra resources remain available, we should turn our attention to ensuring that they are fairly allocated among hon. Members. They should not be allocated on a personal dispensation basis. If passes are to be rationed to 150, the decision as to who should have those passes should not be left to a couple of people, although I appreciate their difficulties and do not criticise them in any way. If we follow the report's recommendation, as I believe we must, we shall put the disposal of those 150 passes not in the hands of a Committe of the House or of the institutions which provide the assistants, but in the hands of one or two Back-Bench Members who, for the best of reasons, organise the courses that bring those students to Britain. We are not only disguising a deficiency in the facilities that are available, but we are in danger of perpetuating an arbitrariness in the way in which we allocate those part-time, ill-equipped researchers.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I was approached by outside sources to take on a part-time researcher from America. The small print at the bottom of the letter said that, as a Member of Paliament, I would receive an honorarium of £150. Has the right hon. Gentleman come across that practice?

Mr. Williams: I have not, but it is interesting. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Member for Deptford will have come across it in his investigations, and he may care to observe on the effect of that in his speech.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Would my right hon. Friend allow me to correct a wrong impression that seems to have gathered pace in his comments and in the comments of the Leader of the House? Hon. Members on both sides of the House have worked hard to make the opportunity of working as interns to Members of Parliament available to British students. Programmes at Leeds university and the City of London polytechnic, in which I have been involved, enable British students to work here. They are working here in increasing numbers and are largely replacing students from overseas.

Mr. Williams: I shall deal with that point later in my speech. I recognise the role that my hon. Friend has played in trying to interest British universities in taking up this facility, should it continue to exist.

If the use of such interns disguises a real need, the House must decide whether that is the best way to deal with it. Are we simply providing training for students from institutions to which the House has no commitment and no obligation? It is an arbitrary allocation of a highly valuable benefit, which is no doubt used as an inducement by the institutions to which the facility is made available. Hon. Members who have had such students working for them say that they are pleasant, industrious and willing to help, but they also say that they have often had to provide a tutorial role and have had to spend much time finding work that the students can do.

If we are saying that the House exists as an adjunct to a few American universities, so be it. But I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that we should try to ensure that such a valuable training facility is offered first to our universities. The fact that we must employ overseas students highlights an inadequacy in our universities, not a lack of industry on the part of those who organise such courses. As my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield explained when I discussed the matter with him, British universities do not have the modular system adopted by the Americans, and it is not so easy for their courses to be structured round long visits to the House of Commons. If, as the report envisages, we continue to allow such temporary access, I believe that British colleges should be made aware of the fact and should be invited to put forward propositions for accommodating their students within the system. We should not allow it to continue as a perk to a few American colleges to which we may be indebted for the free service, but to which we have no obligation.

The fact that I have no expertise in and limited knowledge of information technology is rather sad, since I was the Minister responsible for the microprocessor application programme in industry. However, when I talked to top industrialists about the application of information technology, my inadequacies were largely concealed by their ignorance. The House of Commons is still at the abacus stage in its application of information technology to back-up facilities. Such technology offers us not just the facilities of the great universities, but information storage and retrieval at unrivalled speed.

I was astonished by the comments of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) this morning. I thought that since he had seen fit to give his opinion to the nation, he might have condescended to do the same for the House. I have never heard such twaddle as I heard him speak this morning on the BBC. There he was—the great intellect—sitting and thinking great thoughts. He said that we do not need researchers and that he is against all this nonsense. He said that the role of a Member of Parliament is to point out to the Government what they said previously and to show how that is inconsistent with what they are doing now. He said that hon. Members need all their time to think, and seemed to believe that it was inconsistent to do that and to have research assistants.

Mr. Dalyell: Remembering that it is 12 July, I wonder whether the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) is marching with the Orange bands.

Mr. Williams: Such an activity would match the intellectual content of his performance this morning. If one followed the logic of the right hon. Gentleman's comments, one would go to university, sit one's final exams in the first week, and then study for the next three years because one's great thoughts should not be trammelled by information or by data. It was a most absurd, damaging and irrelevant contribution to the subject.

Our trouble is similar to that of industry: we are dealing with unprecedented rapidity in the evolution of technology. Nearly every product that comes on to the market is obsolescent the moment it appears. Its successor is already on the drawing board. Industry finds there is never a right time because there is always something better around the corner, and does not know what is the best time and place to carry out major investment.

We are perhaps fortunate in having a decision imposed on us by the need to turn our attention by 1990 to the new parliamentary building. That is a critical element in our considerations of the type and range of facilities we offer and when we offer them. Most of the population of the same age as the average Member of this House is blind about the new technology. There are people like my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon who are very knowledgeable and can do their own programming and do everything required to make full use of these facilities. But that is not the case for the average Member or even for the majority of Members of this House, nor is it the case in much of British industry. Industry buys the equipment that is able to use the technical resources now available.

In a way, that relates to the other report. If we are to have the information technology facilities envisaged by my hon. Friend—and I am not suggesting that should not happen—it may be that the introduction of the new technological resource will add to the pressure for back-up staff who will be able in the short term to help Members make use of the new information facilities available to them. I suspect this problem will gradually disappear. We have to plan for new generations and this is where 1990 becomes relevant. At successive elections a new generation of Members will be increasingly at ease with the new technology and will not need such back-up support from staff. They will automatically expect the availability of the new technological resource within their workplace.

Mr. Soley: I support what my hon. Friend has been saying. I have had an Apricot computer for just over a year and have found out, not surprisingly, that my PA and researcher use it more frequently than I do and to good effect, and that is very helpful to me.

Mr. Williams: If my hon. Friend had a 13-year-old son or daughter, as he might have, he would find that child using it even more than any of his assistants and utterly at ease with it. It may well be that what we need for the average Member in the short term, as the report touches on, is the word processor with memory and so on. That would make an enormous difference to the way in which many of us carry out our work. We then have to plan further ahead for the correct facilities. Because 1990 is the deadline, in the interim period we should be looking for the minimum capital investment or commitment, so that we can put the latest state of the art into the new building. In the interim period we should have the minimum fixed capital equipment needed to enable Members to obtain the data they require.

I am not in favour of imposing on Members a choice of equipment. When eventually a facility is available it must be for the Member to decide whether he wants his system to be compatible with the system operating here. It would be wrong for the Fees Office to say, "What you intend to buy is not compatible and will not be admissible". On the other hand, it would be a foolish Member who bought equipment that was not compatible with the system introduced into the House.

Mr. Wigley: On this matter of compatibility, will the hon. Member accept there is a need to consider it not only in the context of the Palace of Westminster and the new building, but also bearing in mind that some Members have their own installation in their constituencies? I have a £7,000 installation which my partner was good enough to invest in to support our work on a parliamentary level. There must be compatibility with the constituencies, and that means linking a telephone line into any system here.

Mr. Williams: That is correct. Whatever decision is ultimately taken on any system will be wrong, because any system adopted here will be transient and that is a result of the nature of technology. Whatever system is adopted here will impose a discipline on each Member, both in terms of his constituency activities and his House of Commons activities.

The new building will give us a focal point in time to which we should relate. My hon. Friend recognised this in his report and the Leader of the House also recognised it in what he had to say. We should not make our decision on the basis of intimidation through ill-informed comments from the press about expenditure. In fact, we are talking about relatively small sums of money in national terms, as I intend to show.

The two reports reveal the appallingly low level of expectation here as compared with comparable parliamentary institutions, or even certain major local government institutions, within this country. We should bear in mind that we are talking about facilities not just for 640 Members, but for a Parliament legislating for 55 million people. When we assess the cost it is not just the cost divided by the number of legislators. One has to recognise that Members of Parliament are the main channel, on behalf of their constituents, for dealing with abuses and they are the main channel of access to Ministers. Therefore, the cost has to be seen in terms of the whole country and the facilities that Parliament provides for the country, rather than as a per capita benefit for individual MPs.

If we take note of ill-informed criticism it will not be just our loss; it will be our constituents' loss. It will also be Parliament's loss because, unlike the Leader of the House, while I recognise that Parliament has always had its phases of effective operation, it is possible to improve upon the effectiveness of Parliament and the quality of our operations here. Take, for example, the simple situation which happens many times a week—the presentation of statements to the House. We get approximately three hours notice and the average Member has no prior knowledge of what is to come. He does not have the benefit the press has, and an Opposition Member has about one hour's advantage if his opposite number is generous enough to ensure that the copy arrives on time.

Parliament needs to respond quickly, and it is no good saying, as the right hon. Member for South Down said in his radio contribution this morning, that Members should go to the Library to get the information they need. If we tried to form a queue at the Library on every statement to obtain the information we feel we might need in order to deal with each statement, the queue would be substantially uncatered for and the statement would be completed.

Mr. Sheerman: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are 18 researchers in the House of Commons Library for 650 Members? Is he further aware that in a Select Committee a succession of evidence is presented by major Departments, and my own experience of three years in the Public Accounts Committee was that one needed some research even to know what penetrating questions to ask?

Mr. Williams: That is exactly right. My hon. Friend reveals what most of us accept. Considering that there are only the 18 staff, what is remarkable is the quality of service that they manage to provide. Whenever I have asked the Library for information, I have always been astonished by the willingness and speed with which the staff have attempted to obtain it for me.

Mr. Onslow: With respect, the hon. Gentleman is on a false point. By their very nature, statements in the House attract the attention of hon. Members who specialise in the subjects concerned, and they can be expected not to need to go back to square one and research. It would be unreal to suppose that every hon. Member should be armed with a brief covering the subject dealt with in a statement when, apart from anything else, we all know that only a small number of hon. Members with an interest in the subject are likely to be called to make an instant reaction to a statement.

Mr. Williams: I ask the hon. Gentleman to think back to his Shadow days, for example. In general, the role of the Chairman of a specialist Committee and the role of an Opposition Front Bench spokesman is to have as much information as possible relating to the work of the relevant Department. Even so, any Department is so wide-ranging in its activities that to have such information is incredibly difficult. I ask him also to remember that Front Bench spokesmen get an hour's notice of what is contained in a statement and can ensure that their response is relevant to what the Minister says in his statement. The Back Bencher has no prior knowledge of the contents of a statement and is at a grave disadvantage. Speedier access to information would be of great value to him.

I think that I have made the points that I wanted to make in a debate that is not intended to reach decisions. I wanted to throw in a few random thoughts on both aspects. The reports are useful but, by the Committee's remit, are too restricted to cater for the solution of the problems that they tend to reveal. They reveal that hon. Members still need proper office and secretarial facilities in their constituencies. They still need proper office, research and secretarial facilities in London. We have not even addressed ourselves to how we ensure proper and adequate communication between this Parliament and what is happening in the European Parliament.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I am rather surprised that the debate is taking this form, because I had a feeling that it might have been more constructive if we had had an opportunity at the outset to hear from the Chairmen of the Committees which produced these reports rather than having to put a number of questions to them and then, in the light of their replies, possibly come back to them. As it is, I fear that the form the debate is taking may handicap earlier speakers, because we want to hear from the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) and the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) about their reports.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): The hon. Gentleman should not make the mistake of assuming that only the Chairmen of the Committees are capable of explaining the reports. The other members of the Computer Sub-Committee are here and are more than able to explain what is proposed and so enable hon. Members to make up their minds before I reply to the debate.

Mr. Onslow: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his modesty, but I should still like to hear from whichever of his colleagues he thinks is better able to present the report before I make any critical remarks about it. We are forced into this position, and I do not think that it will improve the structure of the debate.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House about the need to be cautious in committing ourselves to future expenditure and about the imperative of treating the money involved as if it was our own. There are tests of cost effectiveness and value for money which need to be applied to both reports and which I hope to outline briefly.

I am surprised by some of the presentation of the argument on temporary and unpaid research assistants. I regret the importation of this curious word "intern". If there was an accurate description in English which we could recognise, it might be "casual apprentice". "Intern" carries with it an implication of expertise which almost by definition these people do not have. They come here to learn. They come here to be taught. Some hon. Members are fortunate enough to be offered a small fee for teaching them. But the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) put his finger on it when he admitted that he is too idle to discipline himself to make proper use of them —in other words, to teach them what they should do.

I do not see this place as pre-eminently or even peripherally an institute of higher education for undergraduate aspirants to the world of politics — [Interruption.] I am not interested in their nationality. Anyone who wants to learn about politics can find better places in which to do it than the House of Commons.

Mr. Sheerman: That is an interesting thought.

Mr. Onslow: At least it has got the hon. Gentleman thinking.

I wish to ask one fundamental question about the report on information technology. Why is it presented to us without the methodology? Where is chapter 1 of the report? In trying to analyse the value of the report, I wanted to see on what it was based, how large the sample was and what questions had been asked of the hon. Members who contributed to it. The only enlightenment that I could find is contained in page 3 of volume II:

"Chapter One outlines how we conducted the study."

It goes on to admit that

"the sample is biased towards those more favourably disposed toward the use of Information Technology."

Turning back to the list of the contents, I see:

"Chapter One: survey of methodology [Not printed: summary only]."

That is a pity. If I were a director of a company which had a report submitted to it recommending major expenditure of a significant kind, and the people putting it up said, "We shall not bother to show you the methodology because you will not understand it," my reaction would be, "I am sorry, but I need someone else to advise me. I am not prepared to take this advice on trust."

Mr. McWilliam: I am certain that an hon. Member of the hon. Gentleman's experience knows that those papers not printed in reports are made available in the Library. He can gain access to them any time that he likes.

Mr. Onslow: But what consolation is that to members of the public who want to see the basis on which we make our report? I am sorry, but that will not do.

In reading through the report, I tried to deduce how many hon. Members had made an input to it. I can find only eight besides the hon. Member for Blaydon and his colleagues on the Committee. I do not regard that as a representative sample of opinion or experience in the House, and the report is fatally flawed as a result. All its recommendations and findings on the needs of Members of Parliament and the justification of the costs are open to question on those grounds. That is why I should have liked to hear the hon. Member for Blaydon present his report. I should have liked his answers to those questions before I was obliged to make my remarks.

Looking through the report and trying to find the justifications in it, I am further disappointed. We are told on page vii:

"institutions outside the House are busily embracing this technology as a business standard."

It adds that the House will need to keep up with such advances if it is to play its full political role:

"The growth of statistical data available and the mass of other information with which all Members must deal makes the speedy introduction of an effective information technology system of vital importance."

There is a tremendous dialectical leap there. It is a major non sequitur. I can put it best by saying that we are not a business organisation. Hon. Members, for whatever reason they come here, may make policy decisions, but they do not make executive decisions. Therefore, we have no need for the type of information which in business is essential to good executive decision-making.

Nor has it ever seemed to me to follow that the more information available to anyone, the wiser he becomes. There is no necessary connection between those two states. No doubt there are some hon. Members who benefit from having more information. However, a mass of information presented to me does not necessarily make me any more competent in my judgment.

Mr. Soley: That is a rather silly argument. Of course an hon. Member can be flooded with information and use it badly, but if the information is well analysed he tends to use it better. If we follow the hon. Gentleman's argument to its conclusion, we end up banning schools because it is obvious that any education is bad.

Mr. Onslow: I do not think that the House should concern itself with education. The hon. Gentleman's intervention does nothing to rebut my argument that the processes which are appropriate to business do not apply to the House. We have certain quite different functions and needs. To apply the business analogy is to mislead the House. I have nothing against word processors. I have a daughter who teaches people to use word processors, and I regard them as a very useful tool, but I do not believe that the advantages set out in paragraph 16 on page ix are so compelling as to justify all the expenditure that is outlined there. A rapid response to constituency inquiries does not depend upon the possession of a word processor by an hon. Member, if the information required needs to be obtained from a Ministry or a local authority. Having a word processor on one's desk would do nothing to speed up that process.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Onslow: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because I have a great deal to say.

We should not kid ourselves that this is a significant advantage and that it will improve our performance. Nor do I think that effective cross-indexation systems or access to wire services are so important as to justify massive expenditure, even though it might enable the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) to get the cricket scores without having to take his pocket television set everywhere with him.

The report contains a certain amount of disproportion, which is not surprising, because it is pre-eminently written by the producer side of the information technology business. The user side has not come across as effectively as it might. That is no doubt the fault of the House, because the number of hon. Members who responded was relatively small and largely confined to those who are specialists in information technology and extremely interested in using it. I doubt very much whether that applies to all hon. Members.

Mr. Williams: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that when deciding who should take part in the pilot study it is important to include not just the computer "buff", but a fair cross-section of hon. Members?

Mr. Onslow: It is essential to do that, and I should have thought that it was self-evident. I am glad to have the right hon. Gentleman's support. The pilot study might also show that the number of hon. Members now in the House and those in future Parliaments who might wish to use information technology remains a very small proportion of the total membership and that the need for which provision must be made is very much less in both cost and physical terms than has been suggested. It is possible that the provision of information technology facilities for 20 per cent. of all hon. Members might meet all forecastable needs. We need to find out about that before we spend large sums of money. That would be done in business, and in our continuing approach to the subject I hope that we shall be thoroughly businesslike.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman says that Members of Parliament should be allowed to have the facilities that are useful to them rather than that we should impose upon all hon. Members the responsibility of moving parliamentary neanderthal man into the high technology area. He is only saying what many Members of Parliament have said for some years, which is that hon. Members need to operate in the way that suits them best.

Mr. Onslow: Of course, but the argument in the report is that provision should be made for high technology on the same scale as when the new office buildings were provided. A large number of filing cabinets and expensive shelves and cupboards were installed, which most hon. Members do not use, so we ought to relate supply to the perceived demand, which I submit is very much smaller than the report suggests. All hon. Members work in different ways. There is no typical Member of Parliament. Every hon. Member should be free to organise his life in what seems to him to be the best way. We should not force technology upon Members of Parliament if they do not want it.

Dealing with the report on research assistants, I should have liked to ask the right hon. Member for Deptford who chaired the Sub-Committee whether, in his opinion, the opinion sample taken was adequate. As far as I can see, he received only 15 replies to the invitation to make a contribution. If that is the full extent of the input of hon. Members to these findings, I cannot accept the proposition that that is an adequate sample.

The report does, however, contain one interesting piece of statistical information, even though I suspect that it is now out of date. It relates to the number of secretaries and research assistants employed by hon. Members in 1984. It is to be found on page 4 of the minutes of evidence. The most significant statistic is that over 400 hon. Members do their job satisfactorily with the assistance of only two staff —presumably either two secretaries, or a secretary and a research assistant. That is the kind of factual evidence upon which some of the conclusions in the report ought to have been based.

[Mr. Onslow]

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): It is important to bear in mind that when the report refers to two secretaries or to two research assistants it very often means half a secretary and half a research assistant. That is all that one can possibly afford.

Mr. Onslow: I am not aware that the report establishes that these figures are resource limited. I see no evidence to that effect, nor do I see any evidence of whether the hon. Members who figure in the returns employ secretaries who do not possess House of Commons passes but work in the constituencies. We are concerned with the pressures on facilities in this building and the reasons for those pressures. I should have liked research to be carried out into the number and work load of research assistants and secretaries who are employed by the 100 or so hon. Members who need three or more of these people. I should like to know why those hon. Members feel that they need those resources. Sampling on that basis would have told us much more about the decision that we need to make. That decision will demand either the provision of more facilities, or the limitation of access. The burden of the report is towards limitation of access, for reasons which I think are sound, but the report's recommendations do not go as far as they might.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Onslow: No, I have given way several times.

If further work had been done, it would have been possible to break down the requirements to the point where the solution could have been seen more clearly, but already there is evidence to suggest what the solution is. Most hon. Members do their work with two staff. Why, therefore, should increased pressure be put upon the facilities of the House in order to accommodate those other Members of Parliament who, for reasons which we do not know, feel that in some cases they must have up to six research assistants or secretaries with passes which give them access to parliamentary buildings?

Most hon. Members to whom I have spoken would settle without question or dissent for the proposition that any Member of Parliament should be free to organise his support staff as he likes and to employ them where he likes, but that it would be fair if access by his staff to this building were limited to two, which would enable one secretary and one research assistant to come to Parliament, if they wished. Why should the others? What is the need? Where is the requirement? It is not clear to me, and it does not seem to me to follow from the report. I hope that in due course my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will put down a motion to that effect. It might do a great deal towards helping to solve that part of the problem. Even if it were arbitrary in its application, it would correspond to the majority need and would be seen by most hon. Members to be fair.

Another clearly perceived problem about research assistants involves their interests. The subject is dealt with in the first report from the Select Committee on Members' Interests. In considering the limitation of access and the accreditation of research assistants to hon. Members, we should also accept the Select Committee's recommendation:

"We recommend that the holders of permanent passes as Members' secretaries or Members' research assistants be required to register any gainful occupation which they may pursue other than that for which the pass is issued, and that a copy of the Register should be placed in the Library."

Research assistants who are given passes include people who are not really working for hon. Members, they are working for themselves, I pass no value judgment on their work, but they do not work for hon. Members. They may be working for a body like Age Concern or for a commercial organisation. Those facts should be known and I suspect that my proposed limitation would do much to reduce the number of research assistants in the House working for charities or commercial organisations. I believe that that is a desirable objective and I shall be interested to hear the views of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

The other matter that arises from the report of the Services Committee is security. This subject is not wholly within the Committee's remit, but it was appropriate for it to be raised. The pressure on facilities must create security problems. Those who are responsible for security arrangements become overloaded, as do so many of our other facilities, including catering, photocopying and so on.

It is important that the House should note that aspect. It is accepted that photo passes are necessary for all those except members of the public who come here only occasionally and for private purposes. Has consideration been given to requiring everyone except hon. Members and staff of the Departments of the House to wear their passes? It is common practice in commercial organisations for passes to be worn, to enable people to be identified and their reason for being in an office to be known. If that possibility has been considered and rejected for the House, I should like to know the arguments that were used. If the idea has not been considered, I hope that it will be.

Many of my colleagues believe that we need to exercise much more self-discipline in the burdens that we impose on this building and in our demands for resources and the expectations that we arouse among our staff and others. Until we appreciate that fact, we shall not be able to come to terms with the facilities which it is reasonable to expect the taxpayer to give us.

Mr. James Tinn (Redcar): When we show visitors round the House, we usually show them in the Princes' Gallery the model of the Palace of Westminster as it used to be and tell them how the belated action by the Treasury of getting rid of wooden tally sticks and the false economy of using them as fuel in the boilers of the House of Lords resulted in the pipes overheating and most of the building burning down.

I am glad that that happened, because I suspect that if it had not the Leader of the House would have been telling us today how desirable it was that we should have a new building, but that there was a lot of public opposition to the idea of a tower with a clock at the top and that, in any case, we could not afford it now. That is the substance of the Government's response to the Select Committee's report, and it is disappointing.

Politicians have endlessly lectured industry about the need to modernise. Industry is at least trying to catch up.

but we are being discouraged from setting an example. We lead the world in the use of computers in our schools and we have every right to be proud of that fact. Children at primary school can grapple with the complexities of computers. Are hon. Members so technologically illiterate that we cannot use them?

There have been criticisms in the press about our proposed expenditure. I cannot think of any section of the community that is less qualified than the press to criticise others on this matter. Where the press has high technology, it does not dare to use it and most parts of the press do not have that technology and do not even aspire to acquire it. If we are foolish enough to take advice from the press, I hope that industry, commerce and the rest of the country will not do so.

I had the pleasure of serving on the Computer Sub-Committee and we spent many hours taking evidence, not only from hon. Members who were good enough to make thoughtful and detailed contributions to our consideration, but from a wide range of people from outside, including users, suppliers, designers and programmers of equipment.

The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) mentioned the comparatively small number of hon. Members who gave evidence to the Sub-Committee. The small response was understandable, bearing in mind that only a small number of hon. Members were acquainted with computers. That number is growing quickly, but when we started our deliberations few of us had a great contribution to make. I learned a lot not only from other hon. Members, but from the evidence of outside witnesses.

I think that my colleagues on the Sub-Committee will agree that we were impressed on our visit to the Canadian Parliament where we saw the installation of a system which we believe to be relevant to our needs in at least two ways. The Canadian Parliament suffers, as we do to an extent, from having its functions dispersed over a number of buildings. Indeed, it is probably even more inconvenient for the Canadians, given the Canadian winter and the problems of communication and keeping in touch are particularly difficult. Many of us also have to do much of our work at our desks, quite a distance from the Chamber and the centre of activity.

The second way in which the Canadian system is relevant to Westminster is its comparatively low cost. Clearly, shrewd and efficient bargaining had taken place between representatives of the Canadian Parliament and various contractors, particularly in the cabling of the system. The original tender was rejected and the work was carried out at a fraction of the first estimate.

I became interested in this subject three years ago when home computers were first coming on to the market. I believed that they could be used for Members' purposes. Since then, I have been experimenting with my work stations at home and in Parliament based on the BBC micro.

The Leader of the House has rightly said that we should be as careful with public money as we are with our own. I assure him that I and a number of other hon. Members spend a fair proportion of our own money on these activities. We do not complain about that, but we certainly have not been squandering our own or taxpayers' money.

For the benefit of any hon. Members who may not have a great experience of using computers, I shall briefly refer to the purposes for which I am using my system. Its word-processing application is of overwhelming importance. It is a delightfully speedy process. I find myself writing more letters because it is easier to explain a difficult point as the words are printed on the screen almost as my mind conceives them. Consequently, I am using this facility more and more, rather than depending on my secretary. The computer is useful to write letters to my constituents, and to compose speeches and press handouts.

My computer system has useful fringe benefits. I have developed a program that enables me to call up a large number of addresses, not just alphabetically, as in the ordinary address book, but in categories of interest or location. This is the well-known data retrieval facility. I have adapted a similar program that enables me to find —provided I have put the information on the computer — all the press cuttings and articles that I have considered would be useful in the future. Often hon. Members file these articles somewhere and can never find them again. This simple process enables me to feed into the computer the source of an article and what it is about. Long after I have forgotten the article I can find a reference to it on the computer and use it in preparing a paper on that subject.

The computer's summary of my current case work is useful, not least when a Department replies some months after my original letter was sent. Sometimes a Department inconsiderately does not mention the name of the constituent concerned but simply states, for example, "Replying to your letter of 3 March". The Department assumes that it does not have to tell me on whose behalf I wrote or what the letter was about. In such cases, the names are readily available on my computer.

I have another index that tells me whether I have already signed an early-day motion. This is most useful when hon. Members ask me to put my name to their motion. I do not have to trouble the Table Office unnecessarily.

Access to Prestel, Ceefax, Oracle and mail boxes will be most useful to hon. Members. I hope that, eventually, hon. Members will have access to the updated POLIS when it becomes more user-friendly.

The computer diary provides a back-up to my own personal diary. One's personal diary, which may remain unopened on one's desk or closed in one's pocket, is therefore useless. My computer diary bleeps to give me sufficient time to get across to the House to fulfil an engagement. It provides me with a printout of appointments, including a selection of these appointments —for example, it is useful if I want to know how many speaking engagements I have. If I cannot remember when I have arranged to see the director of education, I simply type in "education director" and the date comes up on to the screen.

These are well-known uses, which I have enumerated only because they may not be known to all hon. Members. Of course, they may be known to those hon. Members who are here. I believe that this facility is admirably fitted to meeting the needs of the House and is not confined simply to business uses. I warmly support the report's recommendations. I am disappointed at the initial response of the Leader of the House, and I hope that a different response will be forthcoming.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I am grateful to be called so early in the debate and am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Redcar (Mr. Tinn). He has resolved a mystery that has been puzzling me for some time, but I did not like to ask him about it. I am accustomed to hearing a "Beep, beep, beep" in the middle of meetings. I now know that it is the hon. Gentleman's diary telling him that he should be somewhere else. I am doubly appreciative of the fact that the hon. Gentleman, who is one of the valued members of the Library Sub-Committee of which I have the honour to be Chairman, continues to stay for the rest of the proceedings. His commitment to the running of the House is shown by his participation in the Computer, Catering and Library Sub-Committees.

As Chairman of the Library Sub-Committee, I want to bat on behalf of the Library. The Library is often taken for granted. It is sometimes seen as a fine suite of rooms along the riverside frontage of the House and a corridor containing many books. That is as far as people's perception goes. The Library has greater functions and facilities than normally manifest themselves to hon. Members and the public.

We are debating these issues on an Adjournment motion. This is an opportunity to air opinions. I believe that there is a need for urgent consideration and commitment to the future, especially in relation to accommodation facilities. We are under distinct pressure, and I hope that my remarks on the Library will demonstrate that.

The report recommended that certain steps should be put in train immediately after the Easter recess. Unfortunately, this is our first opportunity to consider the report. The pressure does not lessen with time: it increases. Would it not have been better for the report to be dealt with on a motion that enabled positive action to flow from it, if the House agreed, rather than have what is, in effect, a talking shop motion?

The wide issues which have already been brought to the surface in this debate need careful consideration. I understand that the information technology report does not necessarily lend itself to a motion that invites instant action. Nevertheless, hon. Members have stressed the need to grapple with the issues.

I am concerned that the Library should not be taken for granted. It has a finite level of resources which are voted by the House. It exists to serve the House to the best of its abilities. It is my pleasure to be able to compliment members of the Library staff on their phenomenal achievement. An interesting analysis of this achievement shows that in every Parliament the level of inquiry rises above the level of inquiry experienced in the previous Parliament and increases steadily through the ensuing Parliament, so that, in the past six Parliaments, there has been a steady increase in the use made by hon. Members of the research facilities of the Library.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The hon. Gentleman has made an important point. The distribution of the use of the Library by different Members is as skilled in this Parliament as it was 20 years ago, but the more exotic services are still used by a small minority of Members. However, they must still be provided. Is that not a lesson for the information technology services?

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. He is right. I observed that the demand on the Library facilities achieves a new plateau after every election that is above the previous plateau, and then demand increases during the course of that Parliament. Sometimes, it tails off marginally at the end of a Parliament, but the following Parliament asserts a yet new level.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I readily agree with the hon. Gentleman's compliments to the Library staff. It is one of the finest libraries in which I have worked. Is the hon. Gentleman satisfied that the staffing resources in the Library are able to cope with the increased demands, or do they require more staffing?

Mr. Shepherd: The answer to that will become more apparent as time goes on. I do not want to give a categoric answer on this point because we have problems on where we go from here and how we cope in the time until 1990. The Library understands the problem, and when phase 1 of the new Bridge street parliamentary site came up it became apparent that we should try to secure part of that site for future development of the Library services. I was very glad that the House saw fit to accept that recommendation, and we are now well in hand with the creation of a bigger and better Library facility involving the capability for bigger and better research output in the future. However, that will not happen until 1990, so my concern is what happens between now and 1990, and how we overcome the problem of the steady increase of work required by Members and asked of the House of Commons Library.

Part of the growth—I cannot quantify how much—has come about because of the increase in the number of research assistants. Whether research assistants raise the points that they ask hon. Members to place on the Library, or whether they place inquiries themselves on the Library is not clear. However, we know that 80 per cent. of requests are placed direct on the Library by hon. Members and 20 per cent. by research assistants. We have to recall that before 1977 the branch Library did not exist. Now, the branch Library in Norman Shaw North is so heavily under pressure as a consequence of the growth of the number of research assistants and facilities that it is essential that we take action to contain this problem, pending at least 1990. It may be that, come 1990, we shall have a bigger problem which requires yet further thought. This is some of the thinking behind the recognition of the problem.

When we took evidence on the loading in 1984, we found that there were 252 research assistants with temporary passes category 9D. In 1985, in an update, we have found that there are 295, which is an increase of 43, so the problem is now more difficult to cope with than it was when we first took evidence. The branch Library reports to me that things became worse up to Easter of this year, with the January to April term particularly difficult, with severe overcrowding in the branch Library.

At that time, six organisations were sending American research assistants. The problem has eased since Easter. Only one organisation has research assistants here under informally agreed procedures. I understand that there are 15 or 20 freelances as well. There have been no contacts with the other groups. About 35 overseas research assistants are using the Library — let us call them temporary research assistants—who are, in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), personal apprentices.

The branch Library feels that it can cope with the present circumstances, and the report came to that view as well. However, when more than 100 overseas research students had access to the branch Library facilities, the branch Library could not cope. Whether research assistants in that category come from the United States, the United Kingdom, Iran, India or anywhere else, the loading on the staff in the branch Library is high because of the high educational input that has to be made for most of the time that the research assistants are with us.

Once again, it is a tribute to the patience and quality of the branch Library itself that its members are able to cope without going completely out of their minds. We owe it to them to recognise this problem and to make their lives as reasonable and easy as possible.

I am not agin research assistants per se. However, I should like it to be recognised sometimes that they are not necessarily all research assistants but are more personal assistants. We might make life a little easier for ourselves if we were to refer to them as personal assistants, because often the personal assistants are those who direct the Members' inquiries towards the source of resolution rather than initiating inquiries themselves.

The Library is a finite entity and there is nowhere for it to go. Therefore, we have to make it possible for the Library to survive until 1990 without the level of service falling or hon. Members' reasonable expectations being disappointed. That is why I want an urgent and early implementation of the recommendations in our report on Members' accommodation, called "Members' Staff: Pressure on Accommodation and Facilities".

In the meantime, we must direct ourselves to the restriction. The report has various ideas about restriction. It is worth while bearing in mind the fact that this concept is not new. Although in theory the 650 Members could have 650 secretaries and 650 research or personal assistants, we do not all have one of each, although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Woking remarked, some have more than one of each. Therefore, we already have a certain self-denying ordinance.

A long time ago, before we had additional facilities in the branch Library, the Library recognised that research assistants would require access to the main Library. We restricted the numbers of research assistants to 200, and that restriction was accepted by the House. A rule was added that there should be no more than 15 research assistants in the main Library at any one time. Since that restriction was introduced, not more than 15 have been required to be in the main Library. There has been voluntary restraint, and in some respects the pressure has not been as high as it might appear to be.

It is also interesting to note that many of those people on the 200 club list are no longer research assistants. There are a number of secretaries on the research assistants' list with access to the Library. That is possibly a manifestation of a changing scene. The emphasis is moving away from the main Library to research at arm's length through the Library's research facility, which has grown so remarkably over the past few years.

There are 10 fewer permanent research assistants than there were a year ago. Someone who is described as a research assistant on the 200 club list may be a secretary who has the added convenience of being able to pop into the Library and look up "Who's Who" rather than have to go somewhere else.

I have put down my markers as to the implications of any changes that may be brought about. We can get ourselves into 1990 provided that there are no major changes. However, I have noticed, as I have no doubt my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will have noticed, that there is an early-day motion on the Order Paper with about 200 signatures which asks for increases in personal research facilities. If we accept that—I do not advocate that we should or should not—we may blow the Library and its ability to cope with the load that we put on it. We must recognise that point and be prepared to deal with it.

As there is no way in which the Library can expand physically over the next five years until 1990, the House would be well advised to consider that point before leaping in in a way that could lead to a major growth in the work being placed on the Library.

Mr. Sheerman: I have carefully followed what the hon. Gentleman has said. He has advanced a logical and sound argument. Why are the Library resource parameters unbreakable? There is a good building to let opposite the Abbey, near the accommodation that we already rent. Why is there such tremendous pressure on resources? Why do we not rent that building and put in some extra staff so that Members can obtain the facilities that they want now instead of having to wait until 1990? Temporary measures can be taken speedily.

Mr. Shepherd: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I work within the constraints placed on the Library at the moment and I report on those constraints. If the House feels that that is what we should do, it will no doubt take the necessary steps. The House cannot expect a much greater expansion of Library services within the present structural framework. The Library is already a Gulag Archipelago of little bits deposited over five sites with tenuous lines of communication that cause a great deal of manpower wastage just getting information from point A to point B.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), who has responsibility for the Property Services Agency is not here. I had hoped that he would be, so that he could accept my thanks on behalf of the Library for making available the resources necessary to implement paragraph 26 of the report in advance of the recommendation being adopted, so that improvements can be made this autumn to the fifth and sixth floors of Norman Shaw North. That is good, and no doubt when he reads the debate he will take on board the appreciation of the Library staff, the Chairman and Committee who find that a substantial boost to morale.

I wish to deal briefly with the information technology report and its implications for the Library. This has been mentioned, but there should be no expectation that increased availability to Members of information technology will reduce the Library's work load. It will not. I am confident that it will increase it. The Library experts advise me of that, and I have every reason to believe them to be correct.

That new dimension constitutes a considerable extra facility for Members. They will therefore expect a new dimension in services from the Library. The flexibility given by electronic mail will improve matters. One will be able to put a request into the system out of hours and possibly receive a response out of hours. That will mean that we are not so dependent upon the availability of research staff over the desk.

I sound, however, a note of caution about the cost of Parliament. My right hon. Friend mentioned this. We are letting Members loose with a not inconsiderable spending power in terms of their access to various databases. We have two types. We have the POLIS system which is good, and I can see that being accessed for the most part by the Library's research staff, although as time goes on more Members will get the hang of accessing it, so the demand on the system will increase. That has a not unreasonable cost implication. Prestel, Ceefax, Oracle and all the other proliferating databases are paid for by the minute. It will be easy to get the habit of dabbing into those databases regardless of the cost. We must bear that in mind. It amounts to an open cheque book.

If we decide to go ahead with the system recommended, can its designers bear in mind the fact that we shall have to arrange for Members and staff to become acquainted with it so that they can understand how to obtain the best value from it? We do not want to spend money regardless and get it wrong. We all work differently. We range around the buildings. We are peripatetic. We do not want to be pinned down to a work station. I agree with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) who spoke on the radio this morning. I do not want to be pinned down to a desk. I want to be able to be in and out and around. We must remember the need for simplicity, reliability and flexibility.

The Library is the biggest and oldest user of information technology within the Palace. It has an immense well of expertise which must not be overlooked. The strengthening of the links between the Sub-Committees is welcome, as is the strong professional connection. I urge that that close cohesion and co-operation is engendered at all stages as we move into these curious uncharted waters which face us. The benefits to the House will be enormous if we get them right. There will be confusion if we get them wrong.

11.18 am

Mr. John Silkin (Lewisham, Deptford): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd). I do not believe that there is any Member of the House who will not echo the justified praise he has given to the Library and the staff. We are all greatly indebted to them, and it is right that that should have been said today. I am also grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the part that he played in the joint deliberations, because he is one of the begetters of the report. The Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee and the Library Sub-Committee joined to consider the matter because plainly the pressure placed on the Library facilities by research assistants and others is of great importance. I express the gratitude of the other half of that Committee for the work that was done by the Library members.

I find it odd that the deliberations of the Computer Sub-Commmittee should have been put together with those of the joint Accommodation and Administration and Library Sub-Committees. However, that is the way in which the Leader of the House works. He is a man gifted with the ability to see 101 different things all at the same time. If that is the way that he enjoys a debate, who am I to interrupt his fun?

I find myself obliged to spend a short time talking about the Computer Sub-Commmittee's report only in so far as it affects the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee. I promise the House that I shall go no further than that.

The House will appreciate that the annunciators are nearing the end of their life in their present form. The report accepts that we will not be able to continue with the present system for very much longer. This presents us with the choice of using a system which employs the existing cabling or examining another system, considering the possibilities of a different sort of cabling and assessing the advantages that that might give to Members in future. It would be futile to reject the pilot study that the report suggests. To use the term "criminal" to describe such a rejection would perhaps be going too far, but it would be rather a stupid thing to do. There must be a thorough examination and I emhasise that that is essential.

The hon. Member for Hereford said a great deal for me and for the Committee when he talked about research assistants. He observed that one of the recommendations was that the report should be put into effect immediately following the Easter recess. It seems curious logic to say that we must deal with the matter of research assistants immediately, so let us adjourn the whole issue without voting on it. Surely we must hear what the House has to say. I suggest that the issue will be taken up not at Easter, not when the House goes into the summer recess and not at Christmas but at some time in the Greek kalends, when the Leader of the House or his successor will suddenly say, "Perhaps we should do something about research assistants". At that moment perhaps the bright idea will occur to the right hon. Gentleman or his successor to set up a joint committee to examine the issue and report on it. In the meantime nothing will be done.

The joint Sub-Committee had a problem which has been solved in the past. It faced the difficulty of bringing together three distinct issues. It was a more difficult task than bringing together one or two opposing points of view in the same area. When there is a point of view and an opposing point of view on much the same issue, the old British habit of compromise can be introduced and a resolution can be achieved in that way. Instead, the joint Sub-Committee had to consider three distinct factors. The first factor was the freedom of hon. Members to choose what employees they wish to have to assist them with their work in the House. This freedom of choice, which has been recognised for centuries, is vital. The second factor was the need of hon. Members to do their work in such a way as not to conflict with the work of other hon. Members. If certain services are overloaded and the result is that some hon. Members are not able to do their job, it is clearly necessary to find a satisfactory balance. The third factor was the need of hon. Members to be informed. I understand why the Leader of the House does not wish hon. Members to be quite as well informed as he is. However, it would be difficult for them to be so even with 100 research assistants.

Do we want to return to the days when there were no Select Committees? Do we want to return to the days before the introduction of information technology? Do we want to return to the days when Ministers used to write out by hand all their own statements, as they did in the 18th century? I remember reading that one of the troubles with the French Revolution that caused everyone to execute everyone else was that those in authority had to do all the work themselves. They had no secretaries to assist them and consequently they were worn out. That does not seem to be a useful way of conducting our labours.

When I was the Chief Whip of the Labour Government I took the view that it was not useful to go through the night discussing legislation. I am glad that the House has somewhat changed its view on all night or very late sittings. Things are still quite bad but they are not as bad as they used to be. The Leader of the House must accept that there are changes and that change will continue.

I am surprised that the Leader of the House did not seek a decision on the modest proposals that are contained in the report. As I have said, the Committee had three different factors to consider before coming to a decision. It had to make the judgment of Solomon, in effect. The Leader of the House, who has a sense of history, knows that the judgment of Solomon was never carried out. I wish that he had not taken that precedent so much to heart.

Dr. Godman: My right hon. Friend has said that there is a need for Members to be informed. Will he acknowledge that it is essential that we are informed? We must all be well briefed. But how useful is a temporary research assistant in this endeavour? In paragraph 16 of the report we find that a witness talked about temporary research assistants disappearing just when they are beginning to get used to our work. At that stage a completely new lot of assistants arrive with little knowledge of Parliament and its work. How useful is a temporary temporary research assistant?

Mr. Silkin: The answer lies with Members themselves and not so much with research assistants, provided that they are of reasonable quality. My right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) made a fair and reasonable case but I must quarrel with him gently on one issue. Research assistants do not beg to be allowed to come to this place and there are fewer research assistants than Members. We must recognise that Members want their assistance. If Members did not want temporary temporary research assistants, they would not be available and they would not come. I know that the Leader of the House is a great believer in the free market economy and the laws of supply and demand. I am worried that he has not taken that point firmly to his heart. I think that he is beginning to slip; he is becoming slightly Fabian.

Mr. Williams: My right hon. Friend will recollect that I made two optional interpretations. I said that it was likely that the existence of research assistants—they have been called angels—was disguising a need that the House should face. In that way I was agreeing with my right hon. Friend's argument. I think that the need should be met properly.

Mr. Silkin: I did not think that it was for me or for the joint Sub-Committee to go into the broader question of whether we have all the research assistance that we need in a modern age. I know that that question exercises the minds of a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House. Any visit to Congress or to some European Parliaments convinces one that we are 100 years behind the times. However, it would not be appropriate to take up that matter now.

Mr. Sheerman: My right hon. Friend is aware that Members need the help of research assistants. There are some who want to make American research assistants scapegoats for the resources that we have in this place, but Members with common sense do not take on anyone who will be a nuisance. They take on assistants because they desperately need help, whether that is at the level of photocopying, "gofering" or for a myriad of different jobs that the modern legislator has to undertake. These assistants provide a valuable service and they are not pests.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): And they are free.

Mr. Silkin: The fact that they are free makes them to most hon. Members rather more desirable. If the House wishes—it will at some time, of that I am convinced—to provide the funds in such a way that will not penalise hon. Members, I am sure that hon. Members will take on assistants of a more permanent nature. However, I am not altogether convinced that that would be desirable.

I like the idea of people, so long as they are competent, coming from the former colonies and elsewhere and learning a little about democracy. It is good for them and it is good for the United Kingdom. Provided that they are properly treated, they are our friends for the rest of their lives.

We point out in our report that they come not only from the United States. They come from Iran—I should have thought that Iran had a lot to learn from Britain—Korea, India, Germany and many other countries. The fact that they come from those various places is valuable from our point of view.

Mr. Onslow: So that the passionate intervention of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) does not discolour the true picture, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that much evidence was given to his Committee by people who were able to evaluate, from a detached point of view, the work of assistants? Will he confirm that that evidence showed that many temporary apprentices were seriously under-employed and were in some cases used mainly to collect and open mail and take messages? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it does not contribute greatly to understanding between nations if somebody who comes here to undertake such work is treated as a dogsbody?

Mr. Silkin: That is so, but that is a criticism of the hon. Member concerned rather than of the assistant, and it is not my purpose or that of the Committee to spend time criticising our colleagues. We could of course do that, but the House would then have to set up a sub-committee for that purpose.

Given that we have limited facilities — the hon. Member for Hereford faced up to this in the Committee and in the House today—what are we to do? We must have some form of rationing. That was an issue that we had to consider. We must give hon. Members the freedom of which I spoke and the right to be fully informed, if they wish to be informed, but we must not overload the various facilities in such a way as to cause a nuisance to other hon. Members.

In particular cases a nuisance can occur. The hon. Member for Hereford put the Library first, and so do I, because that is the core of the learning and of any ability that we have to serve our country. There are other facilities, such as catering. The hon. Member for Hereford, being a member of the Catering Sub-Committee, has experience of that. It is not good—I put it no higher than that—if we and others who are more permanently employed are not able to have proper refreshment facilities because of the presence of people who are here for only a short time.

Another factor which comes up more and more these days—in the Accommodation and Administration and Library Sub-Committees it comes up almost every week—is the overloading and over-use, and sometimes the perhaps improper use, of photocopying machines. There must be a limitation of use. That is what we have tried to deal with, though we accept that it must be a sensible limitation, and that is why we have made our recommendations on that type of subject.

In the course of making those recommendations, we were enormously impressed by one group of producers of overseas assistants, Educational Programmes Abroad, because it had a disciplinary basis; it taught its young people something about the House of Commons before they came here and impressed on them the need to conform with certain standards. I suspect—as I believe the Committee did generally—that where our colleagues have justifiable complaints, too often they arise because of young people not being employed on that sort of collective basis, but being employed willy-nilly by hon. Members for a short period and never really learning what this place, its traditions and importance are about. That is why we were impressed by those who were willing to adopt a disciplinary code.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that several programmes exist by which students are supplied to the House and that rigorous procedures are carried out under those programmes, including visiting constituencies and party conferences and having intensive meetings, before students are let loose in this place?

Mr. Silkin: To be fair, I agree that it happens in a limited number of cases, and we made that point. We were impressed by those cases where that happened. That is why we made our recommendations on the subject and recommended, for example, that there should be a limit on the number of temporary research assistant passes.

I agree with the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) that the phrase is a misnomer in that they are not necessarily research assistants. "Personal assistants" might be a better description. I am not sure about the use of the word "apprentice"; hon. Members, rather than those whom they employ, are sometimes more likely to be apprentices.

Mr. Simon Hughes: While accepting that research assistants should be here for a longer time, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that any hon. Member should be permitted to have more than one at any one time? I am also worried by the use of the word "employed" because some of us need responsible and capable people who are willing to give perhaps two days a week for a year or two without payment, and it may be necessary for us to employ somebody else for another two days a week without payment. They are not, in the strict use of the word, employed.

Mr. Silkin: We were essentially talking about passes being issued to people from overseas. There is no such restriction on passes being given to people from these islands.

Mr. Onslow: I am interested to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that no consideration was given to restricting passes for assistants unless they happened to be of overseas origin. Was that a conscious and deliberate decision by the Committee in approaching this subject? Did the right hon. Gentleman or his colleagues consider my proposition—I thought that it would be the fairest, if the roughest and readiest solution—that there should be a limit of one secretary and research assistant with passes, or at any rate two personal staff, per hon. Member, however many others hon. Members might employ outside?

Mr. Silkin: We considered among ourselves whether it was possible to make such a numerical decision, but came to the conclusion that it was not. Practicalities affect the question of home-produced personal assistants because, as was pointed out earlier, British universities do not at present regard work experience as part of courses. Therefore, the question does not arise to the extent that it does with American universities which, very sensibly, include this kind of activity in their work programmes. Working in this place cannot be substituted for a summer term at Oxbridge or anywhere else, even if the student is reading politics or philosophy. In that regard, we are way behind the United States. The practicalities therefore led us in the direction that we took.

I believe that the recommendations are fairly clear. It is a pity that the House was not given the opportuniy to get on with the job and simply to pass them. It can always say that the recommendations do not go far enough and that we wish to return to the matter again, but the present method tends to prejudice the possibility of getting on with things.

The hon. Member for Woking was the only hon. Member to raise the important question of security. Here we are in some difficulty. I believe that we are all too lax about security. We accept the need for it, especially after the dreadful occurrences in Brighton last year, and we know that the House is vulnerable but we seem not to take the matter personally to heart as much as we should. If Members are to have the freedom, which in my view they should have, to choose whom they employ to help them, the onus of dealing with the security aspect must fall on them. It was a difficult matter and we included it late in the day following the Brighton outrages. I hope that we have got it right, but I believe that in the end the onus must be on Members to see that it is dealt with properly.

We are dealing not with a compromise but with three essential rights that a Member of Parliament should have—the freedom to choose those who help him, the need to be informed and the need not to interfere with or damage the work of his colleagues. I hope that we have got this reasonably right but I have no doubt that the House will return to it time and again over the years. I venture to suggest that we shall never reach a permanent solution because I do not believe that such a solution exists.

11.42 am

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): The hon. Member for Redcar (Mr. Tinn) was disappointed with the attitude of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I was well pleased with it, as it seemed entirely reasonable. At a time of so much administrative change it is as well to have a sensible pilot at the helm. I was, however, disappointed with the speech of the hon. Member for Redcar, as he appeared not dissatisfied enough with the status quo.

The hon. Gentleman made sound comments about the future; but I wish to consider how things can be made more tolerable in the five years during which we shall have to live with the present conditions, which are very difficult to improve, until the new building is available in 1990. I was pleased that my hon. Friends the Members for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) and for Woking (Mr. Onslow) addressed themselves to the problem of what can be done now to make things better.

The lot of a Member of Parliament has improved a great deal since I arrived in this place 30 years ago. We are much better paid. We have allowances for secretaries, for research assistants, for living in London, and so on. Even our wives have travel vouchers. All those things were unheard of 30 years ago, as was the help that we now obtain from information technology. Life is also harder. There is greater pressure from constituency work and correspondence, and parliamentary hours are longer. Our constituents are better informed and the demands of the House are much greater. All those things are inevitable and it is no use deploring them. I wish to deal with the tribulations that we have brought on ourselves and about which we may be able to do something.

The use of one or several research assistants per Member of Parliament is a new phenomenon and a perfectly natural development to meet the increased pressure. Some Members, because of the nature of their work, can fully employ one or several research assistants. Others, however, get such an assistant and then find that they cannot fully employ him or her, so the poor research assistant is set to work brewing up large numbers of questions to some miserable Minister in an attempt to fill up the time. Some Members may ask as many as 200 or 300 questions. As surely as night follows day, if one asks hundreds of questions one's correspondence and surgery work will double. The research assistant will then be overworked. The Member then engages another.

Does all this make one a better Member of Parliament? In my view, asking 500 questions does not make one a better Member of Parliament and may actually do a great deal of harm to this place in the process. Whether that is the right or the wrong way to behave, however, the result has been that there are now many more assistants. The research assistants did not come here uninvited. We have caused the problem. If the cafeterias are full to overflowing and the Library or the branch Library becomes a bedlam, that is our doing, for better or worse and whether we wished well or ill; it is up to us to do something about it.

As no additional accommodation will be available for several years, I believe that all of of us — the Government, the Services Committee and Members — must agree to lay down some rules now to stop the rot that we ourselves have started. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Woking that until we have a great deal more room Members should in general be limited to one secretary and one research assistant each. I say "in general" because clearly exceptions will be necessary for shadow Ministers and so on.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Woking also pointed out, those Members who rightly and worthily use all the information technology available often do not appreciate that a large number of Members get on perfectly well without all that and are not bad Members of Parliament as a result. For instance, 241 Members have no research assistant. They do not pay their secretaries £12,000 per year, so they could afford research assistants if they wanted them. The amount of research assistance available outside the House is often underestimated. I have been interested in Honk Kong for many years, but I do not have research assistants gathering information for me about Hong Kong. The high commission provides an endless supply of press cuttings, and many other organisations provide any information that I need. In the modern world, a large number of organisations, trade associations and trade unions are becoming very good at this kind of work and a great deal of information can be obtained in that way.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that hon. Members should be made entirely dependent on vested interests? The sources of information which the hon. Gentleman suggests we use often have a financial interest.

Sir Paul Bryan: The hon. Gentleman must not go through life terrified of these people. We get information from whom we want and judge it according to who supplies it. Hon. Members are supposed to have sufficient judgment to sort out what information is good and what is bad. I am unalarmed by that consideration.

There is quite a considerable discrepancy between the numbers of permanent or temporary secretaries, and permanent or temporary research assistants as stated in parliamentary answers and by the Serjeant at Arms. That discrepancy reflects the ebb and flow of students, but there is no doubt that the trend is constantly and rapidly upwards. According to figures supplied to me by the Serjeant at Arms, there were some hon. Members with nine, 10 or even 14 research assistants on 1 May. Hon. Members are entirely welcome to such numbers of research assistants as long as they are watered, fed, accommodated and car-parked somewhere else than in the Palace of Westminster.

Students are welcome if we can give them the sort of education and treatment that they deserve, but it is quite apparent that we cannot. My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford gave many sensible reasons for that. I should have thought that, for the time being, the flood of students should be stopped. If we had the accommodation and the facilities, it would be very nice to be able to help them with their education by a few months attachment to this historic place. However, we are unable to supply such a favour in present conditions. At the moment, the arrangement is inconvenient to us and positively unfair on House of Commons staff in the Libraries and restaurants. Moreover, I should have thought that the students must leave with a less than favourable impression of the mother of Parliaments.

As for parliamentary questions, I can express an interest or lack of it, in that I have never been a prolific questioner. I have asked very few during the past year. What are the further thoughts of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on the uncontrolled growth in the number of questions? The latest figures show that it costs £67 to answer an oral question and £41 to answer a written question. For that reason alone, there must be a limit to the number of questions that can be asked.

We are equipped with an admirable reference library and it is hard to see any justification for 800 questions a year. Three hon. Members asked 800 questions in the last Session. That meant that each hon. Member's questions cost at least £33,000 to answer. I cannot believe that that is right or that our constituents would think it reasonable. I am sure that if the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) were here he would jump to his feet to explain the virtue of his various questions. Oh, here he comes. I am not suggesting that the questions are good or bad, but there is no disguising the fact that some of the questions now being asked are largely a publicity stunt or, more worthily, a method of holding on to a marginal seat.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Yes.

Sir Paul Bryan: There is no reason why the Government or taxpayers should pay for that.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the Government made the disclosure of information an automatic part of their processes half of the effort that hon. Members have to go to to extract information, often getting no answer the first time, half an answer the second time and an unsatisfactory answer the third time, but eventually the facts, would not be required?

Sir Paul Bryan: I can only tell the hon. Gentleman that Back Benchers in all Parliaments of which I have been a Member have never been satisfied with the answers they get from Ministers. Even if unbelievably Ministers gave entirely satisfactory answers, nobody can persuade me that that would reduce the number of questions that are asked.

Mr. Dalyell: I make this point quite quietly. Yes, I tabled a great many questions on a particular subject because it was clear that the Government were not being candid. The cost of those questions, in so far as it was a cost, was not the difficulty of getting information, as the information was readily available in the Ministry of Defence, but the fact that Ministers did not want to reveal the truth and therefore had to synchronise one answer with another. The quick response to the hon. Gentlemfan is to suggest that he reads Ponting's book, especially page 129. If the hon. Gentleman had sat through the 11 days of the Ponting trial in court No. 2 at the Old Bailey, he would have seen the extent of the dissemblement. That is the justification for asking so many questions.

Sir Paul Bryan: So that I can get on with my speech, let us all agree that the hon. Member for Linlithgow is a bargain for the nation at £33,000.

Mr. Dalyell: Rubbish.

Sir Paul Bryan: Can my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House explain what are the alleged arrangements for the control, if that is the word, of visitors to the Palace of Westminster? The scene on the Terrace of the House of Commons is often not attractive, especially in summer. It gets overcrowded and some visitors seem to stay there drinking for hours at a time with no host Member of Parliament in sight. I am aware of a regulation which provides that no guest should be left for more than 15 minutes, but who enforces such a rule? Is it not time that a specially selected and tactful policeman was asked to inquire from time to time what right people have to be in various places? I do not mean just the Terrace, as we often see characters who seem quite at home in parts of the House which we all think are supposed to be preserved for hon. Members.

To follow what the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) said, should we not consider the machinery of our parliamentary housekeeping? Does it operate with sufficient urgency? The Select Committee whose report we are discussing was appointed on 28 March 1984. It first met on 6 June 1984 and it reported on 31 January 1985. Yet here we are discussing the report 15 months after the Committee was set up, but only on a motion for the Adjournment. Therefore, we have no prospect of doing anything before Christmas at the earliest. If we continue at that pace to pursue the reform of the administration of the House of Commons, matters will get much worse before they get better.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Some of the speeches so far from Conservative Members remind me of the last time we debated our salary increases. The hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), for instance, who had just been elected, said that we should set an example to the nation and not increase our salaries above a certain amount. Then I discovered that he is a barrister. The impression that some people do not live in the real world has been given again today. Many have numerous directorships.

I have never before taken part in such a debate, and I do not suppose I will do so again, but I shall embark on a litte personal pleading. I remind the hon. Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) that since Mr. Arthur Lewis, the former Member for Newham, North-West, left the House, the cost of answering quesions has probably decreased substantially.

Last summer, after the debate on our car allowances, I was so disgusted by the fact that Parliament increased allowances to people with large cars that I wrote to the Leader of the House. I said that, although it was probably good for my soul to accept a cut, because I drive a Mini Metro, it did not enthuse my bank manager.

The problem for many Opposition Members and for a growing number of Conservative Members is that we cannot afford to employ research assistants. I disagree with one part of the Select Committee's report. Paragraph 6, at the top of page vi, states:

"We challenge neither the figure itself"—

the secretarial and research allowance—

"nor the view . . . that it would be wrong to interfere with the individual Member's right to engage staff."

I do not disagree with the latter part of that sentence, but I believe that we should challenge the secretarial and research allowance, which at the time was £12,400, but which has recently been increased to just over £13,000. The allowance is inadequate and bears no relation to the population of one's constituency.

Mr. Silkin: For the record, we did not challenge it because it was not within our terms of reference.

Mr. Ross: I readily accept that. I thought that I might be ruled out of order if I mentioned the subject without saying that it was covered in the report.

I challenge the allowance because it is inadequate, especially when one has a large constituency. My constituency has the largest electoral register, with about 100,000 people. That creates a large work load, especially when 26 per cent. of the electorate are retired, people who tend to write long letters. There are also three prisons in my constituency whose inmates seem to have adopted me as their constituency Member.

I must employ two secretaries—one in the House and one in my constituency—which makes it impossible for me to consider engaging a full-time research assistant. I am already in debt because I employ two secretaries. It is time that that point was made in the House. If one wishes to play a proper role in the House, as I try to do each day, by sitting on Select Committees and Standing Committees, one suffers from the lack of a research assistant. I could do a much better job if I had a full-time assistant.

Another problem is that one is often asked questions by one's constituents, most recently especially on immigration matters and the lists of restricted drugs. In most cases, one does not know the right answer—one would be a fool to pretend otherwise—so one passes the letters to Ministers, whose civil servants must provide the answers. Since the immigration rules change frequently, to be sure of getting the right answer one must always pass the query to the Minister concerned. We are taking up an enormous amount of the time of civil servants, and if we had effective research assistants we could do more for ourselves.

I took on board the request made by Ministers a couple of years ago for hon. Members to deal more with the local representatives of the Department of Employment or the DHSS. I have always had the facility of telephoning them. I even telephone prison governors so that I can avoid writing letters to the Home Office. But that all takes time, and it would save money if the allowance were increased to enable us to employ full-time research assistants.

At present, I am using a temporary, part-time researcher on one project, and I would regard any restriction on my ability to do that as completely unacceptable. Most of the American students of my acquaintance have been surprisingly good at their job and quickly find their way around the House. I hope that they will continue to come, but I agree with the report that there probably is a need to restrict their numbers, at least until we have improved premises, which we should have had long ago.

I cannot understand why we are not able to make use of some of the empty rooms in the vicinity of the Palace of Westminster. There are some in Bridge street and, as the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) who is not in the House at present, pointed out, there are also some over by the Abbey.

Why do we always come last in the list of priorities? I have just seen the office blocks which have been renovated at huge cost for Ministry use. One only has to go down John Islip street to see that. It does not make much sense. I trust there will be no further delays in the building programme, and the words of the Leader of the House suggested that that was his wish too.

Page 12 of the report states that, because the number of permanent research assistants is limited to 200, those Members unable to get a permanent pass apply for a temporary one. It seems unfair to limit the number of temporary research assistants, but the problem is really pressure on facilities, as has been illustrated in this debate. That can be relieved by limited access to them, and we will have to see to that. Evidence was also given on that point to the Committee by the Association of Professional, Executive, Clerical and Computer Staff. On page 19 there are recommendations for devising a method of such limitation, by restricting the hours or the days on which temporary research assistants can carry out research. I accept that restriction. That raises the question of the need for research to be carried out urgently, perhaps when a statement is about to be made and someone wants a quick answer to a query. A special pass could be used in the Library for that purpose.

Vandalism and the need to restrict the Library to academic use were two other subjects discussed. Of course blatant vandalism must be dealt with severely. One way to curb unauthorised use of the Library is to have the Member state the nature of the research he wishes his assistant to accomplish; that could be put on the pass provided. It is a bit bureaucratic, but we have to adopt procedures of that kind if we are to relieve the Library of some of the pressures. I accept everything said in the debate so far about the Library. It is the most magnificent facility we have, and I always tell visitors about it. There is no doubt that socialising is going on in the Library. There is evidence of that, and the Librarian should be authorised to order out anyone who is not on Library business or who is causing obstruction.

We know about strains on the canteen and it is fair to point out that the House is not obliged to provide eating facilities for temporary research assistants. Unfortunately, we have not provided adequate facilities in the precincts of Westminster. There is a facility on the other side of the road, but it is rather expensive. People visiting the House, particularly children coming in with lunch packs, have nowhere to sit. Far too many people are going round the House and that ought to be discussed some time. It is impossible to take visitors around without being in a crush all the time, and we ought to think about restricting numbers. I know there is some temporary restriction now.

When visitors have finished their tour, where do they go? If they are with children, where can they sit down and have a meal? We have not thought that through; nor have we thought through the traffic congestion and all the coaches parked outside. There can be 40 or 50 at any one time in Millbank and Whitehall alone. Members should take on more responsibility for the work of their researchers and the use they make of facilities in the House. Perhaps we should consider assigning temporary research assistants either on a morning or afternoon privilege, so that half could use the facilities in the morning and the rest could use them in the afternoon. At other times they would have to work outside the Palace of Westminster. My temporary researcher comes to me out of working hours and starts at about 6.30 in the evening.

Evidence was also given that the problem about research assistants had lessened during the last year. That information was also given to the House by the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd). Perhaps we are being a little unkind in some of our criticisms. The situation has improved slightly. It may be that some of that comes from the publicity given to the report in the United States of America. A very full report appeared in the American newspapers, and that has probably been taken on board. I hope that the message that got across was not that we were anti-American students. I welcome them from all parts of the world. It is part of the job of the Palace of Westminster, the home of democracy, to be open to such people if we can accommodate them.

I congratulate the Committee on its work. I am grateful to it. I agree with the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) that we should come to some conclusion today and not put it off yet again. I found the report sensible and acceptable, but it would be more meaningful if we had a proper allowance so that hon. Members could employ researchers. That is now controlled by the Fees Office, so it should not be abused. I am one of the 200 signatories of that early-day motion.

I accept that most of my colleagues are getting themselves computerised and that probably I have to do the same. The sooner we introduce the recommended system based on the Canadian experience, the better. But I am no expert in these matters, and I hope that later in the debate one of my hon. Friends will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

12.12 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I apologise through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the House for the fact that I have to leave before the end of the debate. I apologise especially to the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) and the Leader of the House. I undertake to read the report of the rest of the debate.

At the risk of causing a sharp intake of breath, I have to declare a slight interest in that in my name there are five researchers' passes. One or two of my hon. Friends have asked, "Why five?" I shall briefly explain.

The first of those five is a full researcher's pass which is held by my wife, who is my secretary and my personal assistant. In passing, I may be able to do a service to other hon. Members who employ their wives by putting it on the record that this is not, as is popularly believed outside the House, a way for a Member of Parliament to enhance his salary by using his secretarial allowance in that way. In my experience, most hon. Members who employ their wives do so at less than those ladies earned before starting to work here. When I am asked why, I give the answer that will be agreed by every hon. Member who does the same. It is the only way that I can get someone to work for me 17 hours a day and six days a week for the money. It is also the only way that some of us manage to see our wives.

The second and third of my researchers' passes go respectively to a student from Surrey university who pays a visit here once a week and spends half an hour in discussion with me because he is working on a specific research project. He has the pass to enable him to gain access to the building for that period without an inordinate delay at St. Stephens's Entrance. The other goes to a similar student from London univeristy who is studying economics and working for me on a similar basis.

One young lady from my constituency who helps with constituency work has a pass and uses it on the three occasions a year when she visits the building, again to help with access.

Finally, I have an American student from the educational programme abroad, who obviously also needs a pass.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) was right to say that—apart from my wife—these people are not researchers. They are personal assistants. However, the machinery of the House at present is such that the researcher's pass is the only identity document readily available. The proposal to introduce a temporary secretary's pass will undoubtedly be the solution. I suggest to the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) that perhaps a personal assistant's pass as an identity document might serve not only that useful purpose but also help to allay some of the misconceptions that have grown up around these batteries of people who patently are not researchers, as I have demonstrated in my own case. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford said, there is a fundamental difference between researchers and personal assistants.

I, too, thank those genuine researchers who serve all hon. Members in the Library. They provide for Back Benchers a Rolls-Royce service. At very short notice they provide detailed answers to very tricky questions. I do not believe that the individual research worker of any hon. Member could begin to match the service that is provided by the Library.

As for the service that I have received since I entered the House two years ago from students who work on the educational programme abroad, the American students are much derided, particularly by more senior hon. Members. During the last two years I have engaged six American ladies and one American gentleman. Without exception they have all been personable, enthusiastic and willing to learn. They have helped both me and the only permanent member of my team, my wife. They have done dogsbody work.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) is no longer in the Chamber. He said that they could not learn from doing this kind of work. I do not agree. They run errands and do filing; they fetch and carry between the Norman Shaw building where my secretary's office is located and my office in this building, but we make considerable efforts to ensure that they have an opportunity to learn about constituency work and parliamentary work and we provide them with opportunities to witness debates in this House.

I share entirely the view of the right hon. Member for Deptford that investment in overseas students can only be worth while in the long term. This is the mother of Parliaments and the greatest of all Parliaments. The more people understand that and learn from it, the better. I am grateful to the Services Committee for its recommendations. I have no interest other than that I use the educational programme abroad service. The students are carefully picked. I hope not only that we shall continue to enjoy their good service but that they will continue to benefit from the lessons that this House can teach them.

There is a legendary minute in the diary of a west country political association which said that the normal arrangements would be made for the Member of Parliament's "annual visit" to the constituency. Since that minute was written, nearly 100 years ago, I suspect that parliamentary life has changed a little. It is no longer necessary, in the main, for constituents to come to the House if they wish to see their Member of Parliament. Most hon. Members hold political surgeries and pay regular visits to their constituencies. Very often they live there, too.

The need for information technology in the House of Commons to service the changing role of the parliamentarian is paramount. I shall not dwell on this point in depth, because my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) who is the Chairman of the all-party Committee on information technology is to speak in the debate. If we are to be fought by the Executive with word processors, we must be able to reply and to fight fire with fire. I mean no disrespect to this Executive; this is an all-party issue. However, the "people up there", when responding to the inquiries of ordinary Back-Bench Members, increasingly use all the technology that is available to them. Every hon. Member knows that, when faced with a number of inquiries on the same subject, a Department will fire off a standard letter, containing, say, paragraphs 1, 3, 5 and 9 and a personal note at the end. That does not always answer the questions that we are asking.

It has been suggested that research is not necessary for us, and that we do not need information. I have great respect for the hon. Members who have said that, but whenever there is a Minister on the Front Bench there is at least one researcher, called a civil servant—and often four or five — sitting in the Civil Service Box. The Executive has a Rolls-Royce machine looking after it. If we are to serve our constituents in the way in which I wish to serve mine—I am not exceptional; there are 650 of us trying to do the same job—we need the machinery to enable us to do it. That will require information technology and people.

A United States Congressman told me yesterday that he had 14 staff. I do not want 14 people working with me, but I should like to be able to afford to pay two. To forestall questions from Labour Members, I should say that the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and I were outside the Chamber whipping in hon. Members when we last discussed finance for research and secretarial assistance. We must have adequate funding for those facilities.

We are in the people business and, with due deference to information technology, we should not forget that fact. Most of our constituents do not want to be answered by machines; they want to be answered by people. If we are to answer people with people and still spend as much time as possible in the Chamber, we must have the necessary back-up.

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) is not here. On Radio 4's "Today" programme this morning, he made some remarks that I can describe only as sanctimonious and offensive, and it is a gross discourtesy to the House that he is not present to hear what hon. Members think of his comments. I put those comments on record so that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to read them in Hansard.

The right hon. Gentleman said that hon. Members who were unable to work without research assistants were incompetent. I have described how the nature of our role has changed. Another apocryphal story is that hon. Members used to put post aside for three or four weeks in the belief that if there was no second letter the matter was not urgent and the correspondence could be put in the dustbin. Nowadays, most hon. Members like to answer their mail. If we are to do that and still have time to serve on Back-Bench committees, Standing Committees and Select Committees and to do all the other things that hon. Members are required and want to do, we need back-up. It is a question of the service that hon. Members are required and wish to provide to their constituents.

Some hon. Members wish to bring televison into the Chamber and some wish to have radio broadcasting piped through the annunciator system. Those developments will involve information technology, but they would do more than anything else to drive hon. Members from the Chamber. Our staff outside the Chamber allow hon. Members to spend time inside. I believe passionately that those staff must be paid for.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) is more representative of at least the younger generation of hon. Members than is the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). The hon. Gentleman illustrated well the variety of roles of research assistants. I have quite a number of people working with me on various projects. They come to see me in St. Stephen's house without requiring a pass and, by arrangement with the attendants downstairs, they come straight to my office. There is no problem. If officials of the House and the Services Committee would consider discriminating between various types of research assistant, the apparent problems could be ironed out.

The Computer Sub-Committee has done the House a service in producing this report. By making specific recommendations it has concentrated the minds of hon. Members and the House authorities on the types of facilities that might be provided for hon. Members. I think that the hon. Members for Woking (Mr. Onslow), for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and for Redcar (Mr. Tinn) do not greatly disagree. I think that we all recognise the diversity of the interests and needs of hon. Members. It is a matter of working out how that diversity can best be served.

The Committee specifically recommended a wide-band local area network, with minicomputers at the nodes, and that every Member be provided with a £5,000 terminal. This would enable Members to receive not only the annunciator service and the public television channels in their offices, but any television channels generated within the House from the Chamber or Committee Rooms. The same terminal could double as a word processor and an electronic mail terminal for transmitting and receiving messages, and for tapping into information services such as Prestel and POLIS — Parliamentary On-Line Information Service—which is provided by Scicon on contract from the Library.

We do not necessarily have to accept that concept. It was based on a system installed in the Canadian Parliament, which is a less lavish model than the range of services provided by the United States Congress. After the Canadian service was designed, and while the Sub-Committee was working on its report, the microcomputer revolution swept into many hon. Members' offices. The increase in the secretarial allowance and the authorisation to use it for the purchase of office equipment enabled many hon. Members to buy microcomputers, which their secretaries and research assistants use mainly for word processing. The most widely used machines are the Apricot and the BBC Micro, both of which are capable of doing serious parliamentary and political work.

In 1983, after the pioneering work by my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar, I encouraged Labour Members to use the BBC Micro because that machine had a professional capability which was most widely used by their constituents and constituency parties and could, therefore, act more fluently as a means of communicating with them. Some Labour Members, like my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), use Apricot. Conservative Members were encouraged to use one by discounts organised by the Conservative party. I do not think that users of either machine have regretted their choice.

The hon Member for Woking regretted the fact that evidence was not taken by the Sub-Committee from a wider range of hon Members, and I agree. It is fair to remember, however, that the installation of microcomputers was proceeding while the Committee was at work. My hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) was most communicative about the extent to which the Committee's likely recommendations had an effect on the decisions that hon. Members made during the Committee's work. After its report was published, the Committee sent a questionaire to all hon. Members on the use that they were making of microcomputers. No doubt those replies are being analysed and will be available to the House.

Mr. McWilliam: To save time later, I assure my hon. Friend that we have received the replies. We are collating them and will publish the report shortly.

Dr. Bray: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

An essential feature of Parliament is its communications with the outside world. That communication activity should be a major consideration in the design of communication and information services in the House. It should be as open and accessible to the outside world as possible. If an information service is valuable to hon. Members, the chances are that it will also be valuable to outside users. The more that it is used outside the House, the more useful will be the service to hon. Members. Hansard, for example, is no longer required reading for Ministers or senior officials, even in the Department responsible for a particular debate. Permanent Secretaries often do not even read speeches by their own Secretaries of State. Lobby journalists do not bother to scan Hansard, so that the value of speaking in a debate has been much diminished.

Likewise POLIS, because it was constructed mainly on bibliographical principles, is almost unusable for political purposes and is of little use outside the House. An hon. Member who is steamed up with Mr. Speaker or Mr. Deputy Speaker because yet again another hon. Member has been called before him might try using POLIS to prove that a certain hon. Gentleman is always on his feet. He will first have to find a member of the Library staff who can find her way round the labyrinthine code. The printout will be yards long. However, before he writes a powerful letter to Mr. Speaker, I advise the hon. Gentleman to take the precaution of looking up that huge catalogue of speeches by the offending Member, because many of those which are solemnly recorded in POLIS include such gems as "Rubbish" and "Bring baek Cecil" with, of course, full bibliographical references.

Most of the really useful services in the House are used by only a small proportion of Members. Annie's Bar, the Library, and particular services provided by the Library are examples. The same applies to computer services in the House. Any attempt to build up a standard service for Members will result in their being treated as low-grade clerks in social work departments.

Many computer companies would cheerfully stuff the House full of techno-junk with terminals gathering dust on Members' desks while other Members cadge access to useful services outside the House for which the House will not pay because not enough Members are interested. That is what I have been doing for 23 years.

Surely the right approach is to start from where we are and to build on what we have. Let us provide a simple electronic mail and parliamentary information service, readily available and installed, and operating through Prestel or BT Gold or some private service with communications software for the BBC Micro, the Apricot, the ICL and IBM PCs and possibly two or three other micros in common use.

Any hon. Member would be able to look up information, using his own telephone line installed at his desk in the House or outside. We should also let the public in. The House telephone exchange would not be involved. The overloading of that telephone exchange could arise only because of negligence, misuse, or by leaving equipment connected by mistake. Many solutions are in common use.

I checked with Lexis, the legal information computer service, now the only on-line legal information service operating in Britain. The highest number of lines that it has ever had connected simultaneously, with all the lawyers and legal organisations and the Government using the system, is 29. The House might establish a similar service which is accessible to the whole country. All that would certainly not justify yet another Department stuffed with more staff to clutter the Corridors.

In five or 10 years' time electronic media will be the prime form for the storage of and access to information, with print being only a supplementary form. A computer Department would be no more appropriate to the House's needs than a typing pool for all Members and all Departments would be now.

A computer Department concept is a relic of the old days of the mainframe. I remember my days in ICI, where I used to work 30 years ago. The computer Department established a priesthood, a bureaucracy, which stood between the real user of the system and the actual application that he wanted to get on with. The position today has drastically changed. It is possible to have and to operate open systems to which anyone can connect as a user or provider of information. It is possible for those services to be accessed by different grades of user paying different tariffs for different kinds of services. It is possible for access to be provided throughout the country over the public telephone network. It is possible for those services to have any required degree of confidentiality.

I checked with the IBM (UK) sales director about the volume of business on micros versus mainframes. He estimated that, for the first time, in 1985 the value of sales of micros and terminal equipment will exceed that of mainframes and associated bulk storage devices. Even for the manufacturers the position has flipped, from the mainframe centralised service to the micro service under the control of the end user.

The advice that the House gets from the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency still reflects the old world. The CCTA is nothing like as good on micros and their application and extension as it is on mainframe systems. It learnt bitterly the lessons of the original attempts at PAYE computerisation, the computerisation of the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre, Swansea, and of the Department of Health and Social Security at Newcastle. Today, the computerisation of PAYE is being superbly tackled.

However, in the provision of micros for running as essential a service for the Treasury model in the Treasury itself, the arrangements were made by the economists in the Treasury direct with the university outside, with the CCTA coming nowhere near. Such flexibility should be available to all Departments of the House, and certainly to all hon. Members. We cannot be cabined and confined to a particular channel of provision which some organisation in the House thinks it can provide for all needs.

Services should be developed for the business of the House as we conduct it. The Order Paper, next week's business, the state of Bills and so on are the basic material for the information service. The parliamentary unit being set up at Warwick university to give Select Committees and hon. Members access to all the United Kingdom national economy models is an example of the next stage of the work. The House of Commons Commission has budgeted £70,000 a year for five years to build up that unit to provide access to the testing of policies and alternatives on all the mainstream models of the United Kingdom economy. That service can be provided from outside the House, just as any other facility in the House which hon. Members, their staff, Committees and so on will have access to can be provided.

There is also the Central Statistical Office data bank, to which there is access in a room in Norman Shaw North used by the statistical department of the Library. Members of the staff sit there surrounded by all the volumes of the CSO publications. The cost of using the service provided by the commercial firm SIA, which has exclusive rights to the CSO data bank for the exploitation of its material, are so high that the Library staff will access the CSO data bank only two or three times a week. It is much quicker and cheaper for members of staff to get the volumes from the shelves around them.

Members do not have that facility. They do not have all the statistical publications on their shelves. They do not have big enough offices. Therefore, they cannot have access to the CSO data bank. However, the CSO data bank is available on floppy discs which the Library could tuck under a table anywhere in the outlying offices of the Library, with a facility for hon. Members to dial into the micro. They could have a service which is better than that on line to the SIA mainframe, which is so expensive that hon. Members cannot be allowed to use it.

The Clerk's Department has not put up the text of Bills, amendments or statutory instruments on the main legal information service, where they would be a great facility to those outside interests which want to see what Parliament is about and to have an up-to-date picture of the state of play on a Bill. It would be just as easy for the Clerk's Department to send off material and have it mounted in a data bank from which the printed copies could be made as it is to provide it to the printers today. The Clerk's Department should organise that. It should not be farmed out at prodigious cost to the Economist Intelligence Unit or some such great worthy organisation which will come up with a pompous solution which shows that it does not understand how the Clerk's Department works. It can be done. There are Clerks who are computerniks equal to any hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. The Clerk's Department could do that within its own resources.

The annual volumes of the Estimates are available in the Vote Office. They give hopelessly inadequate detail of the expenditure plans for major Government programmes. The hon. Member for Woking is interested in defence. The Navy's full procurement programme of all the ships that it buys each year is voted in one figure. The Ministry of Defence is prepared to provide the detail, and it is available. It is not confidential or secret, but it is not included in the Estimates. If it were included with comparable detail under other heads, it would become far too voluminous to publish. That data could be made available on a data bank. It could be accessible to Members and outside organisations. There is no reason why that should not be done more economically than the publication of those prodigiously expensive volumes.

Any four-year, £5 million programme aimed at putting a black Model T Ford on to every Member's desk is doomed to obsolescence before it starts at a time of such rapidly moving technology. The House should slip more comfortably into the computer age. If each Member in each Parliament was allowed to spend the £5,000 a year on the 1990 equipment and services that he needs, he would obtain far better value. We are, after all, a Parliament of Members, not a bureaucracy. The computer has got out of the bottle and democratised itself. It cannot be stuffed back by men in grey flannel suits. We should allow hon. Members the resources to use the new information technology effectively in the service of the House.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) always entertains and interests the House, especially when he speaks on a subject of this kind. If I may be permitted two preliminary reflections, the first is that on occasions such as this one realises that the House is not divided among members of the Conservative, Labour, Liberal or any other party. It is divided between conservatives and radicals. Even conservatives and radicals do not necessarily agree with one another.

I agree to a considerable extent with the hon. Gentleman. However, I do not agree with his condemnation of the scheme that we saw operating in the Canadian Parliament, to which I shall come in a moment. I share his objective. I do not believe that that objective would necessarily be prejudiced if we followed that example. He said that we do not want techno-junk, and of course we do not. There is a great deal of it about. One of the main grounds for much of the criticism of computerisation generally, let alone computerisation of the House, is that it gives rise to wasteful expenditure and the creation of computer junk.

The other general reflection which occurred to me arose from a remark of the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), who said that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has a great sense of history. Sometimes history is valuable in providing us with a perspective. I recalled as he was speaking that I had read not long ago a comment of the great historian Gibbon on a man called Peter of Amiens. Gibbon's phrase was:

"Whatever he wished he believed and whatever he believed he saw in dreams and revelations."

[Mr. Ian Lloyd]

Most of us in our own particular way are vulnerable to that same characteristic. We wish for things and we tend to reinforce our wishes by choosing evidence selectively to support the view that we seek to put forward. Peter of Amiens had another characteristic, which Gibbon described as

"that vehemence of speech which seldom fails to implant the persuasion of the soul."

The Sub-Committee on which I had the privilege of serving provided an exceptionally interesting opportunity to see what is happening in Washington and Ottawa. Alas, it seems that its report is insufficiently vehement to persuade my right hon. Friend that something must be done quickly. The Committee struggled manfully, if that is the right word, to produce its report before Christmas 1984, but seven months have passed since the report was first before the House.

If we look back to the time when we realised that other major legislatures were moving forward on the information technology front, we are reflecting on a lapse of time of about 15 to 20 years and not one of seven months. That is the disturbing discovery that we made when were were in Washington. There is an old saying that one can take a horse to water but cannot make it drink. If one applies that saying to information technology and politicians, it would be appropriate to say that information technology can be introduced to politicians—the most exciting, dramatic and revolutionary development in man's intellectual endeavours since Gutenberg—but to get them to accept it and understand it is a problem to which even the gods themselves on Olympus would find no obvious or easy solution.

Some weeks ago I wrote in the House magazine that I thought I had heard the rumble of a bandwagon beginning to roll. I was wrong. Instead I heard the rumble of the tumbril. No bandwagon was beginning to roll and there is no evidence yet, despite what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said, that it is about to do so. This is exceptionally disturbing.

I cannot continue without paying my own tribute to what has been done for us with limited resources within a restricted scope by the staff of the Library. Shortly before the debate began, it published an excellent and useful pamphlet entitled "Information Technology: the Role and Services of the Library Department". It is remarkable what we have succeeded in doing on a shoestring. In some ways we can take pride in that, but is it enough? That is the question to which the Computer Sub-Committee addressed itself. It is said that comparisons are always odious, and I accept that comparisons with Congress immediately expose anyone who draws them to the remark that the United States is five times as rich as the United Kingdom and that a Congressman has responsibilities that are different from those of Members of this place. It is said that any such comparisons are invalid. I do not accept that. There are things we can and should learn from both Congress and the Ottawa Parliament.

I tend to apply the one-eighth rule. We have a population that is one quarter the size of the American population and perhaps we are only half as rich. Whenever we consider the allocation of resources for something which is a good idea and whenever it is to be found in the United States, the one-eighth rule should apply.

The Congressional brochure on information systems refers to office automation, electronic mail, survey processing, electronic voting and word processing, all of which are available to every member of Congress, and adds:

"These were only concepts ten years ago. For Members of the House of Representatives they are now a reality."

There is no such reality here. In my judgment and that of the Sub-Committee, there is no reason why that reality should not exist here, and we put the time scale for it at three years.

It was predictable that hon. Members would say that what we were proposing was, in the current national context, extravagant. I accept that all expenditure is extravagant and that what we propose must go through that mill of criticism. However, resource constraint is visibly less of a problem in some spheres than in others where the contribution made by the resources created is likely to be dramatic, effective and necessary.

Some hon. Members—for example, my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), who I regret is not in his place—have implied that what we propose is not necessary. That claim cannot be sustained. The Sub-Committee found that the Canadian system—I remind the House that the Canadian Houses of Parliament were built at roughly the same time as ours and that their parliamentary procedure is roughly the same, being modelled on ours—made the most remarkably efficient use of resources and was a system which seemed, at least as a start, to provide us with a substantial proportion of what we had seen supplied in the United States Congress at hundreds of times the cost. We did not return and say, "We must do what Congress has done." We said, "Let us at least do what our daughter Parliament in Ottawa has done, because it has been done extremely well and we can learn from it."

Dr. Bray: I do not think—though I shall have to check—that the Canadian parliamentary system gives its Members of Parliament access to the up-to-date models of the Canadian economy. That is an example of how the Model T Ford does not meet the requirements of Parliament today.

Mr. Lloyd: I, too, must check on the exact procedure, but I believe that at least one of the 32 channels in use when we were there enabled the Member of the Canadian Houses of Parliament to gain direct access from his computer or word processing system in his office to all the major databases to which that Parliament had decided that its Members should have access.

Dr. Bray: There is a distinction between a database and a service. A service which gives Members access to the benefits and costs of alternative policies is much more sophisticated than a database.

Mr. Lloyd: I accept that qualification, and if the system does not provide the quality or range of service which the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) thinks is necessary, we can look into that when we decide to do something. I am not saying that, because this is something, we must do it. It is an effective and convincing system and I would have thought that the criteria which he suggested could be applied in our thinking on this issue. If it means modifying the Canadian system, let us modify it and make it better, so that it achieves the more wide-ranging and desirable objectives that the hon. Gentleman has in mind. I fear that we are a long way from action. So far, it has been exhortation, information and discussion.

Last week the Economist published a survey of the approach by the City of London to information technology. That is relevant to what we are considering, not least because of the similarity of the problems and scale of resources being deployed, and I shall return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Woking about our not being a business. The article commenced:

"Selecting the right tools takes time, money and a clear view of the future. All are in short supply."

Yes, all—including a clear view of the future.

What is the City of London spending to ensure that its decision-making process is relevant to the present? The survey estimates that about 5,000 firms in banking and finance had spent more than $2 billion on installed computer equipment by the end of 1983 and perhaps $2·3 billion by the end of 1984. The total is expected to reach $3·7 billion by 1988. The report goes on to describe what some of the smaller segments of the City and the financial information world are spending on information technology. Barclays bank alone, a major British bank, spent £100 million in 1985 and NatWest plans to spend £600 million in the next five years.

It may be argued that those are business organisations using that investment to earn and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Woking has said, we are not a business, but let us consider what the House spends in other directions. Only yesterday it was suggested in Standing Committee that coal subsidy is likely to be about £2·2 billion. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has announced a £2 billion social security uprating and I do not dispute the merits of that. Closer to home, the revamping of the stonework of this building, which cannot be postponed, is costing £8 million. We must relate the proposed expenditure of a mere £5 million to the primary purpose of parliamentary government and the efficiency of this great institution. We achieve a better perspective by relating that modest sum to the primary purpose of ensuring not only that this institution functions efficiently but that its credibility survives.

A long time ago, Machiavelli said:

"Nothing is more difficult to plan, more doubtful of success, nor more dangerous to manage, than the creation of a new system. For the initiator has the enmity of all who would profit by the preservation of the old system and merely lukewarm defenders in those who would gain from the new."

I believe that that applies from start to finish in most of our debates about the application of information technology in the House.

From time to time, especially in summer, we observe the large flow of tourists who go first to the Tower of London and then to the Palace of Westminster. Mercifully, the original function of the tower no longer exists but a fascinating ceremonial function survives. People who come here, however, expect to see more than the ceremonial function and the splendid neo-Gothic structure. They expect to see three other things, too.

First, they expect to see a level of freedom of speech attained in few other institutions in the world, including our daughter Parliaments, and we are proud of that. Secondly, they hope occasionally to witness the rare phenomenon that can be seen only in a Chamber such as this — the quality that I would describe as political courage. That quality is rare, but it exists in the House. It would be invidious to name current Members on either side who exhibit it, but I am happy to refer to those who have passed through this place and who showed it in considerable measure. One thinks of Iain Macleod, Aneurin Bevan, Manny Shinwell and many others. Thirdly, the voters who send us here and who then come to see what we are doing expect to see this place acting with relevance and efficiency in its handling of the problems of the state. During the past 10 or 15 years, there has been a perceptible fall in our credibility when it is judged by that criterion.

I have a great affection for this place. The qualities that I have mentioned are such that no democracy can survive without them, but we shall not survive if our credibility falls so far that, when we are considering major legislation, which increasingly involves the most significant scientific and technological components, they are able to say, "Yes, they make very interesting speeches but they are not informed. They do not know. They do not have the information that they need successfully to monitor and check the Executive." That is why I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Woking that we are indeed a business—we are in the business of government. It is the most important business in the land and we shall discharge it responsibly and skilfully, as our constituents expect us to, only if we have all of the tools necessary to monitor the work of the Executive. That is the function of Parliament and we cannot discharge it without information technology.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): It is difficult to follow such a powerful speech. I agreed with almost everything that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) said. When the Leader of the House recalls what has been said and reads what has been said in his absence, he will realise that the debate has not degenerated into an orgy of anti-Americanism, as some feared, and that we have not fallen into opposing camps. If there are opposing camps, they are not to be discerned by the line that divides the Chamber. Hon. Members on both sides of the House want this legislature to play a proper role in modern government.

If we constructed a continuum of legislatures, the most powerful would be Congress and the least powerful would be the Supreme Soviet. I regret that we are probably nearer the Supreme Soviet end of the continuum in terms of influence. One of the reasons for that is that, although we are spending money updating the crumbling outside of the building, we have not taken time to update the internal crumbling by developing procedures such as a proper Committee system.

Now that we have a Select Committee system, we think that we have arrived for the next 30 years. I inform the House that I am doing some research contrasting the defence committees in 30 Parliaments. I can say without fear of contradiction that, although our Defence Select Committee is important and useful and one of the better of our Committees, we have about the weakest defence Committee in the Alliance and democratic legislatures. We cannot sit back and relax in the glory of what has been established. We must improve our procedures but, above all else, we must make ourselves more professional.

I believe that the Leader of the House will recall with regret his assertion that staffing is one of the current fashions. Adequate staffing is not a fashion but a prerequisite of a modern, efficient legislature. I do not mean merely the proper staffing of Select Committees or the Library. I endorse the eulogy of our staff in the Library. They are wonderful but, in terms of numbers, they do not compare favourably with almost any other legislature that I have come across, although they compare very well in terms of quality. I am expected to feel guilty about wanting to use researchers and about going back and forth to the Library, but we shall be doing our job if we push the Library to its limit, have full access to technology and have the best possible staffing arrangements.

There are people who want to be professional, but we have what I call the Daily Telegraph philosophy of government. An editorial in that newspaper a few years ago said that all a good Member of Parliament wants is a good typewriter and a good secretary. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) epitomises that view. He sits in the Library and writes his speeches using his own brilliance. The rest of us are not so fortunate. We need information. It was ironic that the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) denigrated research and then criticised the Select Committee for not having researched the subject properly. He cannot have it both ways.

It is important to recognise that our staffing arrangements are deficient and that we do not compare favourably with the legislatures in America on in Canada, which is a comparable legislature in structure, size and ethos. Yet it is light years ahead of us. The National Assembly in France and the Bundestag are much better staffed than is the House of Commons. It is all right for people to say, "We are going down the road towards the United States Congress." We do not compare favourably even with our parliamentary colleagues in Germany, France and Canada, let alone Congressmen.

Many hon. Members have mentioned American research assistants. I am partly guilty, if that is the right word, of instigating the system and of being one of the first to benefit from the entry of American interns as far back as 1976. I have been working, in a non-financial capacity, with educational programme abroad. As a student of the American west, I believe that American students here form part of what I would call the "Billy the Kid complex". By that, I mean that in the 1880s, any unsolved murder in the south-west of America was attributed to Billy the Kid. Here, if a photocopying machine breaks down, if something disappears or if the lights go out, it is attributed to the American students who, it is said, are flooding the place.

This morning, we heard a great deal of nonsense about catering facilities. Although stopping Americans using our canteen facilities might improve Anglo-American relations, I should stress that they are not allowed to use the Strangers cafeteria. A security man guards access to the restaurant facilities. Americans cannot use the Library and have limited access to some parts of the House.

The latest manifestation of the Billy the Kid phenomenon was on the front page of The London Standard a few days ago. It relates to the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, who sports the most famous eye since Nelson or Harold, and it states:

"Mr. Lamont is said to have told colleagues he got it"— his black eye—

"when he walked into a door left open by his American research assistant."

I have not the slightest interest in whether the Minister walked into someone's fist or into a door but, if he was looking for an excuse, why did he not use one of a hundred other explanations instead of blaming his American research assistant?

That is a humorous example, but it demonstrates this phenomenon that pervades the House, partly because many hon. Members, research assistants and the police have an interest in ensuring that foreign research assistants are kept to a minimum.

I could not function as a Member of Parliament without access to good research assistance. We are given the magnificent sum of about £12,000 a year to pay for a secretary, out of which we must pay national insurance contributions and about £2,000 for equipment. That does not allow us enough over to use the Brooking Institute for research. Far from making matters worse for the British taxpayer, the use of such research assistants from America or from any other source saves the British taxpayer from the natural consequence of the growth of the legislature. Those who are unenthusiastic about research will not seek out an intermediary and say, "Would you find me a research assistant, because I am desperate to have one?" If they do not want free assistance, they will not approach my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) or me. However, those who want research assistance and who cannot afford it have their natural desire for more staff dampened by access to free advice and assistance in the form of foreign or British students.

The people who come in are criticised and alleged to be CIA or KGB spies. Goodness knows what such spies would expect to find in this place. Another criticism is that they are badly dressed, but in many ways they are the best dressed people in this place. They are also alleged to be rather stupid or clueless.

To any hon. Member with an American or British intern who does not meet that Member's requirements, I say clearly, "Throw him out". If a Member retains a student who does not meet his requirements, he has no right to hold a scarce seat in the building. If an education institution allocates a duff student who is not interested, is only here for a holiday, is not prepared to work and does not know much about the subject, a Member should not use that institution again and should tell his friends not to use it. If an institution cannot deliver the goods in terms of good quality students, Members should have nothing to do with it.

Many myths are circulating and some have been mentioned today. Democracy is expensive — one has only to rattle off the cost of this place to see this—but the prerequisite of democracy is surely not Members of Parliament getting their information simply by reading The Guardian or the Daily Telegraph in the morning and then mouthing off. Government and society are getting much too complicated for that. Even in the 19th century the position was too complicated, and we cannot get away with it any more. We need a good system and adequate staffing. If we do not get such staffing, power is going to drain away from us to the Executive even faster. No wonder the Government do not want to see us having more staff, because the fewer staff we have the less burden we are to them. They can cope with the silly Guardian-inspired or Daily Telegraph-prompted parliamentary question. What they cannot cope with is the well-researched question in Select Committee or the Member of Parliament who has researched his information. That does not come by osmosis on the Library floor; it comes as a result of somebody working and providing the Member with the information.

There are, however, legitimate criticisms. The numbers of foreign students are too high and must be restricted. I totally endorse the recommendations in paragraph 24, especially 24(3). On the matter of Educational Programme Abroad, when there was a minor crisis in 1977 EPA said, "All right, if there are any problems we have 30 students here"—there were only 30 American students around at that time"—"and the EPA will voluntarily reduce the number to 20." That was what it did. Whenever there is a problem the EPA is very quick to respond in order to avoid the kind of hassle that could emerge.

Allegations about spies have never been substantiated. There are worries about security, as there should be, but where there is anxiety why not follow the suggestion of the EPA and Rochester university? They say, "Why not subject students in the USA to a form of security vetting within the USA before they come here?" Legitimate means are available to do that. My right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), in a speech I greatly admired, said the onus for security ought to be on the Member. I do not agree entirely. I could know that a student had been checked by university authorities, but I have no absolute guarantee that that person does not belong to a subversive organisation.

If the Leader of the House wants a guarantee that subversive individuals will not infiltrate the House, he should consider the suggestion for some form of vetting abroad. If the students do not wish to submit themselves to that in the USA because it would violate their constitutional principles, then they need not come here, because if they want to come they will have to meet the requirements laid down by the House.

Mr. Shepherd: Paragraph 23 of the report addresses itself to that and the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) also talked about it. Does the hon. Member not feel that the ultimate responsibility must lie with the Member himself? It is up to the Member to check whether or not a student has been through a security vetting and to take responsibility for the outcome. He cannot pass the buck to somebody else.

Mr. George: Perhaps the real answer lies in a combination of both our approaches. Ultimately, the Member must be responsible. However, a very good suggestion has been made. There could be some form of additional information presented to the Member or to the House authorities before the necessary pass was issued. If there is any concern about security, other methods must be explored.

Organisations are sometimes criticised for bringing American students here. If they and we are prepared to meet the criticisms as far as possible, that should remove the criticism levelled against them. There are crises. The photocopying equipment often breaks down. I have already written to the House authorities having had a minor altercation with a photocopying machine two nights ago. To my knowledge, no American was within 50 yards of the machine at the time, and I accept total blame for its breakdown.

The problems of dining facilities have been over-exaggerated, because students are barred from them at set times.

Some hon. Members say that they cannot see how the students are useful. A lot depends on the use made of them. If they are good and if the sponsoring organisation is competent, they are very useful. If the sponsoring organisation is competent, it will have put the student through a preliminary reading test in British politics. Before coming here he will have to have shown a knowledge of British politics.

The report contains considerable detail about the work of the Educational Programme Abroad. It has a lengthy induction course, and a system of lectures in British politics throughout a student's period here, and every effort is made to try to meet the objection that these young people are coming here with very limited knowledge. If other schemes cannot meet those requirements, it is their problem, and hon. Members should not have recourse to those students.

If a Member of Parliament knows how to use him, a student can be of inestimable value. Anyone who is interested, as I am, in foreign affairs and defence looks for a student who intends to do a master of arts degree course in international relations and not one who specialises in social security. If the student's interests are matched up with the Member, that overcomes the alleged mismatch of competence.

I am pleased that much of the paranoia expressed in the press about foreign interns has not been repeated today. There are problems, and it would be foolish to close our eyes to them and to the people expressing those criticisms. If this report is implemented, it will go a long way towards assuring Members of Parliament and the public that the criticisms are not entirely valid.

What is far more important is that we must get it across that the foreign student coming here and paying thousands of dollars for the privilege of working for a Member of Parliament is a temporary phenomenon until we have adequate resources to employ our own full-time staff. Until that day comes, I remain grateful, as many other hon. Members are, to anyone, British or foreign, who is prepared to give up his time and put his expertise at my disposal and that of the House and my constituents.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), I am an enthusiast for information technology. In fact, I was enthusiastic about it before the term was invented. In my hon. Friend's terms, I consider myself a radical.

It should be recognised that information technology is not necessarily good for everyone, especially for every hon. Member. Comparing the work of Members of Parliament with that of company executives or officers in local government, it is not as self-evident as it is in those cases that information technology will be an absolute advantage to hon. Members. In both local government and private companies there will inevitably be a repetitive pattern of activity that is ideally suited to computerisation. In Parliament, however, no two days are the same. Constituency cases vary so much that the scope for computerisation is not so great as it is in organisations of the kind I have mentioned.

The Committee that considered the information technology needs of hon. Members failed to recognise that fundamental questions need to be asked before coming out wholeheartedly in favour of an integrated system, but this is what it did. Many, if not most, of the facilities to which both the Committee and the hon. Member for Redcar (Mr. Tinn) referred are already available. They can be obtained by using the individually chosen equipment of hon. Members, many of whom have either word processors or microcomputers. They could gain little by having an integrated system or local area network. As for word processing, standard letters are useful for dealing with standard problems, but many constituency cases vary from the norm.

We also have to ask ourselves a fundamental question about the free post. Members of Congress in the United States can make almost unlimited use of free post and send out many standard letters. We have not yet defined what is a circular and what is an item of correspondence. Because of the new technology, we may need to consider a new definition.

There is no reason why hon. Members should not use electronic mail to talk to each other either by means of their microcomputers talking to other microcomputers directly or by using a mail box system, such as British Telecom Gold. An internal electronic mail system, a local area network, could be justified only if it was interactive to the extent of allowing parliamentary questions to be put down on the Order Paper electronically from one's desk, or of allowing names to be added to early-day motions, or of allowing new early-day motions to be tabled. But do we want that to happen? That question has not been asked.

Reference has been made to the fact that too many parliamentary questions are asked, at enormous cost. There is a motion on the Order Paper about too many early-day motions being tabled, so would it be advisable for us to provide the means for many more of these activities to be carried on, as they undoubtedly would be, without giving a great deal of thought to the matter?

The other main reason for the provision of microcomputers and computers generally is access to data bases. Hon. Members could use POLIS and other data bases without the kind of multi-million pound system that has been recommended.

As for that part of the report which refers to the implementation of these proposals, the Committee's proposal is that 36 hon. Members should take part in an initial pilot scheme. But would not the 36 hon. Members be the ones who have already shown a great interest in computerisation? What are they supposed to do with the equipment that they already have? Are they expected to get rid of it because it is incompatible with the common system?

We should adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) and build on what we already have. Information technology in the House should be promoted, but only on an evolutionary basis. We should not throw out what has already been achieved by adopting a completely new system. The technology is changing. There will probably be greater compatibility in five years' time and many of the proposals of the report may not be necessary then. The Economist Intelligence Unit report suggests the introduction of a minicomputer system, which now looks out of date, and we may find that the proposals of the Computer Sub-Committee will also look out of date in three years' time.

On Members' accommodation and facilities, I have had mainly good experience of British and American research assistants. I do not believe that they are best used in examining detailed Government policies before hon. Members come into the Chamber to make a speech. I find that they are particularly useful for doing work on constituency problems, to make it less necessary for hon. Members to have to trouble Ministers. Much ministerial and Civil Service time can be saved.

Many hon. Members do not make good use of research assistants. They can be particularly helpful in dealing with constituents' problems and delving for information that hon. Members could find but for the lack of time that afflicts so many of us.

Of course, some temporary research assistants are would-be permanent assistants who are waiting for one of the 200 permanent passes that enable them to use the main Library at certain times. However, not all permanent research assistants who have worked for an hon. Member for more than a year use the main Library. Our current definitions are not helpful and, as the Librarian pointed out, some hon. Members hang on to permanent passes because they may need them at some time in the future.

The present system could be refined and improved even before any major changes are contemplated. The problem is that the sort of rules proposed in the report would be arbitrary and unfair to many hon. Members. The report proposes a four-month time limit on the employment of research assistants, but I can find no logical justification in the report for that recommendation. There is also a proposal that limits should be imposed on the number of permits issued. That would be unfair, because if I wished to offer a temporary position to a researcher in, say, two or three months, I could not give him or her a guarantee that a pass would be available at that time. There is no suggestion that passes could be reserved in advance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) proposes a limit of two passes for each hon. Member—one for a secretary and one for a research assistant. That would probably hit hardest senior Privy Councillors and some former Prime Ministers who tend to maintain larger staffs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) suggested tht there should be exceptions to the rule, but all hon. Members are supposed to be equal and I see no reason why some should be excluded from a rule. That is another reason for not adopting rules that would be unfair to some hon. Members.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the four-month limit. If we are trying to increase the number of British students who help us, perhaps a three-month limit would be more logical, because that would be more compatible with the length of a term in an academic year. We may need to ensure such flexibility if we are to get good people for a sufficient time, while taking into account other demands on their time and our ability to employ them.

Mr. Waller: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Three months would be more sensible than four months, but unfairnesses and anomalies would still arise, and I should like to see some justification for such a rule before it was introduced.

Some hon. Members want to have two researchers each on one day a week. They would not be able to do so if a rule limited them to only one research assistant. Although, superficially, the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Woking looks attractive, it has many drawbacks.

The right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) suggested that the Leader of the House might not want other hon. Members to be as well informed as he obviously is. Perhaps more pertinently, one could ask whether the Executive, which will have to foot the bill, wants to give a bigger bite to the parliamentary watchdog. I wonder whether that question will be answered.

1.30 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This morning at 7.20 I burst the proverbial blood vessel when I heard the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) on the radio. He is sui generis, but he is also a Privy Councillor. Had he not been a prominent Privy Councillor, he could not have argued as he did. Incidentally, if he had had better research, he might have known a little more about the biochemistry of human embryos.

I preface a question to the Leader of the House with a small tale. I was in the Table Office struggling with those very clever Clerks about questions on "that ship". The right hon. Member for South Down came in and I said to him breezily, "Enoch, you need Greek iambics to get anything on the Belgrano out of Ministers." Quick as a flash he said, "Greek iambics should be applied to everything in life." But government is not just about debate. Does the Leader of the House agree with the views of his former colleague? I detected a Powellite view in what the Leader of the House and the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) said. Does the Leader of the House agree, or disagree, with the right hon. Member for South Down? We deserve to be told.

The Library is not just an educational institution. The House of Commons Library is not the Library of Congress. Are we expecting our Library to perform a tutorial role for research students? Many extremely gifted and clever people work in the Library, but I am not sure that the Library has a tutorial role. My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) referred to the "Billy the Kid" aspect. Is it true that certain research students have torn pages out of library books and documents?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels indicated assent.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Why take the hon. Gentleman's word for it?

Mr. Dalyell: I have looked at the documents listed. In a letter the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) stated:

"Dear Major Le Fanu.

It is with some reluctance that I write to you, but I have for some time, together with a number of colleagues who have offices in Norman Shaw North, been concerned not only about the number of American Research Assistants, the hours which they work, the facilities which they use (sometimes, I am reliably informed, for their own purposes and that of a Member of Parliament)".

At least my questions, about which I am sensitive, are my own.

In my defence, if I ever ask for statistics, I am scrupulous about asking for "conveniently available" statistics. Ministers are entitled to give answers stating, "The answer can be obtained only at disproportionate cost." If that happens to me, I take it like anyone else, because I am sensitive about Civil Service costs. The proviso is that a Member could challenge such an answer and ask Mr. Speaker whether he thought the answer was unreasonable. That would be the safeguard for hon. Members.

The Table Office should be out of bounds to anyone other than a Member of Parliament. If research assistants have to deliver questions, a delivery box should be located elsewhere in the building. It is wrong to expect the Clerks to spend time negotiating the format of questions.

I do not intend to be the school sneak, but I said to a friend, a member of the Conservative party, "I see that you have tabled a very interesting question on subject X." I was met by a bewildered, blank look. I said, "Yes, pursuent to one of mine". Somewhat sheepishly he confessed that his research student must have tabled it. It transpired that my friend and political opponent had signed a number of blank question forms. That really is naughty. Questions should not be tabled without the Member being certain of what is involved, otherwise costs will be increased.

I know that the pot and kettle syndrome applies to questions, but I am concerned about more open government. This would reduce the cost of questions. I have the experience, unforgettably and indelibly imprinted upon me, of those 11 days in court No. 2 at the Old Bailey during the trial of Clive Ponting.

I do not know whether the Leader of the House will be pleased, because what I am about to say could damage both him and me, but I agree that Government did have a rougher time in the past. In our parliamentary youth there was a great deal more scrutiny. Particularly under his Government, the politicisation of the Civil Service has occurred.

Much is said about merit awards for civil servants. On what grounds? Because they agree with Ministers, and particularly with what Ministers think the Prime Minister thinks? What about the business of catching the Prime Ministerial eye for Civil Service promotion? If resources are to be devoted to scrutiny and to the work of the House I should like an inspectorate-general, or something of the kind, to whom civil servants can go if they think that they are being abused in the answers that they are supposed to give to parliamentary questions. That might be regarded as fanciful. I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) is smiling, but let me tell him that I am in the exalted company of Sir Douglas Wass, the former head of the Treasury, who takes roughly the same line. Questions are costly when there is something to hide.

I gave my word to my hon. Friends that I would sit down after eight minutes, and that I shall do now.

1.38 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I am glad finally to be called to take part in an important debate on accommodation. We should be debating not only accommodation for Members' staff but accommodation for ourselves. At the turn of the century there were 670 hon. Members, in 1918 there were 707, in 1945, 640 and in 1983, 650. From what I can ascertain from my own research, in days gone by people managed all right. If anybody should be looking for better accommodation it is Members and not their research assistants or secretaries. I have sympathy with the secretaries who work in overcrowded conditions.

In days gone by Members did not have a desk or an office. Until 1969 they were not even allowed to use the phones free. The secretarial allowance did not come in until 1969 when it was introduced at £500. It has risen considerably since, but we must keep the issue in proportion.

It is a privilege to be a Member of the House. We should not come here with caps in hand demanding extra money and extra resources without carefully thinking about what the House costs to run the country.

In an answer from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House only yesterday, I was told that 273 hon. Members had their own room, 242 shared their room with one other, 30 with two others, 32 with three others and 62 with four or more others. Most interesting of all, 11 hon. Members do not have accommodation, although there are no doubt reasons for that. We should be examining that problem before considering the problem of accommodation and facilities for research assistants and secretaries, although there is overcrowding in the House.

Members of Parliament did not even get paid until 1912, when they received £400. They now receive over £16,500. One of the problems is that, with so many research assistants, the House costs the country more. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said that four years ago it cost £35 million to run the House. That increased to £57 million in 1984-85. Research assistants have contributed to increasing that cost.

I felt as though I had been hit when my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) spoke about the number of hon. Members' questions. I confess that I ask a large number, but I do so in the interests of my constituency, because I have a marginal seat, and because I plan my campaigns. I believe in self-interest and self-survival!

The report is already out of date. Research assistants seem to be breeding like rabbits. The figures rise alarmingly year by year. The report shows that in 1985 two hon. Members had 9 research assistants, one had eight, four had six, three had five, nine had four, 235 had one, but 310 had none. The 310 who have managed without the permanent services of research assistants have not endangered their survival nor discredited their useful role.

Unlike any other hon. Member in the Chamber, I have been a research assistant in the House. That was in the days when the Norman Shaw North branch Library was not even properly opened. There were only 12 of us for the whole place, and only the Government and Opposition Front Bench spokesmen had them. It is unacceptable that we had, as I was told in a parliamentry answer on 3 June, 452 research assistants in 1984, and have 469 in 1985. That increase is worrying.

This is a rare occasion for me, but I reinforce the view of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Some research assistants are putting to the Table Office questions that hon. Members have never seen. I know that several hon. Members sign blank forms for tabling questions, and the research assistants do the rest, which is wrong. We are intelligent enough to think up our own questions.

It is fair to say that research assistants have clogged up this and the peripheral buildings. My secretary has to share a room in Deans Yard with a number of research assistants and the secretaries of two other hon. Members. It is overcrowded and the secretaries therefore cannot get on with their work. That office was the attendants' cloakroom and WC.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that I had said that each hon. Member should have no more than one research assistant. Let me put it another way. Each research assistant must be paid. Of course, everyone likes something for nothing, but we are seeking long-term improvements in the House. We need research assistants who can help us perform our duties.

I am worried about the temporary research assistants who seem to be rushing all over the place. I remember in 1976 two American research assistants being caught on the fifth floor of Norman Shaw using baths belonging to the staff. Things may have changed since then, but I am worried that not all of them respect the facilities that are available. They might block the photocopier or disrupt the normal affairs of the day. No one would deny that the Library research assistants do excellent work. There are only 18 of them, but they play a marvellous role. They know what they are talking about and they are obliging to anyone who asks them for help.

I am worried by the report's suggestion for a number of temporary research assistants. I do not agree with that. There will be no proper control over them. The report recommends that research assistants should be properly vetted and that hon. Members should be responsible for them. That is a good point.

I accept that some research assistants will be doing serious work which might advance their studies. The idea that we should allow in temporary research assistants for up to 16 weeks is completely unacceptable. It is a student summer vacation job, and I do not think that the House should permit that.

I regret the fact that the lobbyist has not been considered. I know of one case where the research assistant is the managing director of the company of which the hon. Member is a director. It is strange to have a research assistant who is the hon. Member's boss outside the House whereas the reverse applies inside the House. It is worrying that such people should have access to such valuable facilities within the House. They can pay for POLIS and other data, but why should they have unlimited access to the building and to any Government publications? That costs them nothing, but it costs us and the country a great deal, and it benefits their public relations company. The point was not covered in the report, and that is a serious omission.

I am anxious about the number of identity passes that are issued. So far this year 1,081 identity passes have been issued. There were 1,061 issued in 1984, but only 916 in 1982. As the report correctly points out, that number of people imposes even more pressure on inadequate facilities. There are too many temporary pass holders. In 1982 there were 77 and in 1984, 308.

Excessive demands are made on the Library. The report states that 9,408 calls were received in 1976, when I was working in the House, and in 1984-85, 50,000 calls were received. Of those, 10,500 were from research assistants. In 1976 they made only 144 calls. Is that fair to the Library staff? Is that the right way to run Parliament?

Access to the Library must be more carefully monitored. Access to the Library by research assistants is allowed only on Mondays and Fridays between 10 am and 12 noon. As the Library is closed, they do not have access on Saturdays. Major statements are made during the middle of the week. It is then too late to obtain a brief from the Library. Unless we are doing our duty here on a Friday, Parliament is off for the weekend and access to the Library on the Friday is not of much use. For those reasons, the research facilities of the branch Library are used. It is far too crowded.

All research assistants should be employed for a fixed period and should be paid. I do not want to see cheap labour employed. I am not saying how much they should be paid because that is a private matter between a research assistant and the Member concerned.

I ask the House to consider who is taking advantage of whom. The research assistant comes cheap and is a willing hand. He is bubbling with enthusiasm and thinking up parliamentary questions. What does he gain out of his position? He has free access to the House and is able to mix with senior Members. He receives help with research projects that will probably help him in his law and politics degree at the London School of Economics. I agree with the hon. Member for Linlithgow that papers disappear from the Library. I know that research assistants use the telephones for non-parliamentary work.

It is interesting that 192 hon. Members do not employ secretaries. However, 15 secretaries work for two hon. Members each and one secretary works for three hon. Members. There are 342 secretaries working for and helping one hon. Member each. Apparently 612 secretaries have been issued with photo identity passes. That information was contained in an answer that I received from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House yesterday. Secretaries should be given first consideration, not research assistants, if we have them.

Our crowded facilities demand that action be taken. I do not know whether the number of research assistants will be limited to 100. Equally, I do not know whether our secretaries will be moved out of the Palace to the Norman Shaw building and other peripheral buildings while we, the Members, remain here. I am not here to debate that issue at any length. When the Bridge street building is opened in 1990, presumably there will be an opportunity for secretaries to be situated outside Members' offices. I put that forward as a suggestion. That will make it possible for the Member and his secretary to work closely together. However, I do not know whether that will be done.

I am concerned about the growing number of other staff in the House. There are 931 staff and officers. There are 705 who work for the associated agencies, such as the police, the firemen and those responsible for the property services. There are 315 staff and officers in another place and 82 research assistants and secretaries.

An old chestnut that I continue to raise is that the House is working longer hours. I have studied the figures right back to 1900. I believe that the presence of research assistants has contributed to the House having to sit longer. We seem to be rising later. In 1984-85 the average time of rising was 12.52 am and the latest time of rising was 8.44 pm the next day. Also, we are sitting on more days. We sat for 213 days in 1983-84 and 198 in 1974-75. I agree that hon. Members are busier now than before and that they receive 14,500 letters daily on average through the House of Commons sorting office. I understand that 6·5 million postal items were received here last year.

There are more Bills for Members to consider and it is clear that the day is becoming a busier one. We spent 555 hours considering Government Bills in 1983-84 and only 469 in 1980-81. European legislation is taking too much time. We must ask ourselves how we can improve our facilities. The answer might lie in bringing in computers and having easier access to Government records. That will help, but I ask that the House revise its sitting hours. In 1902 the House sat between 2 pm and 11.30 pm. In 1939 to 1945 the time of rising was changed to 10.30 pm. Since 1945 we have retained that rising time but, of course, the House sits regularly beyond that hour. I urge my right hon. Friend to bring the sitting to an end at 12 o'clock midnight at the latest. If he considers the possibility of morning sittings under Standing Order No. 2, I shall be with him all the way.

I urge my right hon. Friend carefully to consider the new telephone system that is to be introduced. I know that the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) is ready to speak on the subject. I am aware that we are in the computer age, but I understand that the cost of the new telephone system will be £2,037,000, which is incredible. It is an extravagance that we do not need. We can buy our own calculators and digital alarm clocks. The new system is unnecessary.

This House has slowly moved into the 20th century. We have certain privileges. Whatever we say of them, I am sure that we should all fight at the hustings to return here and to those privileges—in other words, to do the job under the conditions that now exist. That is why I urge caution before any changes are made. We want Parliament to be kept in check both financially and politically.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The wind-up speeches are expected to start at about 2.10 pm. Four hon. Members still hope to speak in the debate. I hope that I shall be able to call all four.

1.56 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Following the 20-minute speech by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) in which he urged hon. Members to make briefer speeches, I hope that when he next gets his research assistant to prepare his speech it will be much briefer.

We are today debating essentially the role of the Member of Parliament, and we have heard some neanderthal views on what that role is or should be. We perform a collection of roles. I am the representative of Grimsby and of the interests and industries there; I am a focal point for the problems of my constituents, problems which they bring to me in large number; I regard myself as a party man—that being an essential part of our job because we were elected on that basis — and that involves advocating the policies of the party; I am a Committee man and a legislator; I am a generalist, practising general supervison over the Executive; and I must increasingly be a specialist, concentrating on certain areas, if I am to help make progress in a modern society. I am also a public figure. Some like that and some do not. It is one of the accidents of the job. Being a public figure, one gets mail and business associated with being in that position.

We have so many jobs to do that keeping up with them is not the simple task that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) made out on the radio this morning, in a contribution that has hovered over this debate. For us to keep up with any or all of those jobs in a modern society, with all its complexities, we need much more assistance than was available in the past or than is provided by the House.

It is up to us how much we do, and there is little check on performance. It is for us to decide how many roles we tackle. If we decide to make the best of as many of those roles as possible in the service of our constituents, we should be provided with the tools to do that job—to do it in our own way and on the basis on which we have decided to tackle it.

It might help if I related my experience. Like most others, I started out as a Member of Parliament with one secretary. She was based in Grimsby because the problems are there and people came to my door with them. That secretary found quickly just how much work was to be done. A section in the book by Philip Williams on the life of Gaitskell tells of a Leeds Member of Parliament who, in the 1950s, received 50 letters a month. I receive 50 every day or two. My secretary in Grimsby soon found that she needed somebody to do the typing while she tackled the problems.

I need somebody in London to do the necessary research for the multifarous problems that arise daily or weekly in the House. I also need someone to type for me in London; typing has to be done both here and in the constituency. The Member becomes a sort or perambulating centre. I need a nucleus of organisation from which to perambulate as I go to Committee and other meetings and drive to Grimsby and tackle all the other tasks.

When it comes to providing the backing that we need, this is a legislative slum, the mother of sweatshops rather than the mother of Parliaments. Most other parliamentarians have far better backing. Such facilities as are provided here are under strain. To blame American researchers, when we have called in people from the new world to redress the inadequacies of the old, is monstrous. We have turned to American researchers because they do a good job and we need their services.

I admit that there are problems, including problems of turnover. The Library staff must help the assistants, because they come and go. They would have to help any research assistants who came for only three or four months. The problem has nothing to do with Americans but with the inadequate provision by the House of Commons.

If the facilities are under strain, let us expand them. It is ludicrous to say that the Library is a finite resource. There are 250 rooms in the Palace of Westminster available for hon. Members. It seems that 144 rooms in the building are used for accommodation, some of them only occasionally for that purpose. Why cannot the Library expand to fill the space available?

Why is it made so difficult for us to do our jobs? Queueing time to take visitors around the House has now extended to half an hour because of slow search procedures, not to mention the time spent chasing around to get tickets. Numerous problems are caused by aging and inadequate accommodation. If the House would provide the proper facilities and staff to make the job easier, we might have a right to complain about the Americans who have done so much to ease the problems generated by the present system.

On information technology, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) that personal computers should be provided for Members as quickly as possible, each choosing his own computer. The House could use its purchasing muscle as an institution to obtain those facilities more cheaply and the money that would otherwise have been spent can be used to help to provide services for those computers.

We are becoming overworked and bogged down in detail and we are struggling in our inadequate fashion to survive by taking on American research assistants or whatever other staff we can find. It is up to the House to allow us to do the job that we believe is necessary to serve our constituents as they deserve.

2.1 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Having listened with interest to later contributions, I apologise for not being present when the Leader of the House opened the debate. I wish to comment briefly on the information technology aspect. First, however, I echo the excellent comments of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Gentleman, who seems to be addressing the needs of the House in the modern age. Some of the comments of Conservative Members were more like babblings from the palaeolithic ooze.

Serving a modern democracy and modern needs means the provision of sufficient staff and adequate conditions for them. I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without commenting, as other Members have commented, on the disgraceful conditions in which we expect staff to operate. I agree with the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels)—this is the only point on which I agree with him—that conditions for Members may be inadequate, but that conditions for staff are nothing short of disgraceful. The staff have to work in hen coops, the noise level is intolerable and it is virtually impossible for them to do their jobs, which usually command salaries which would be unacceptable elsewhere. For far too long we have relied on their enthusiasm rather than providing decent conditions. Members also need decent allowances to pay their research and clerical staff properly.

I believe that the Sub-Committee reached good and far-sighted decisions on what should be done about information technology. Out of the alternatives before it, it chose to allow flexibility for Members to link their own personal computers to a local area network. I believe that that decision is appropriate and correct, although it is contrary to the recommendations of the Economist Intelligence Unit.

Two small points, however, deserve further attention. First, although the report is a good one, I believe that it gives insufficient attention to that aspect of a Member's work which, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby stressed, relates not to his job in the House, but to his activities in relation to his constituency. I should have liked more attention to be paid to whether it is possible to set up a communications network with a constituency, to do constituency work more efficiently. Some recommendations were made about hardware, but software is at least as important. Although we might be able to get away with flexibility on hardware, it would be sensible to have much less flexibility on software, because that is the point at which we can have an appropriate interface.

As for funding, we have not taken on board the considerable difference between new technologies and present equipment. We are talking of an outlay of at least £2,000 or £3,000 to equip a Member of Parliament. Although it is accepted that a computer has a life of only two or three years in the present environment, we have no mechanism for allowing for depreciation of that equipment. If we ask Members of Parliament to pay such large capital sums, we should have a system which enables us to allow depreciation for two or three years to accumulate the necessary sum.

I congratulate the Committee on coming to broadly the correct conclusion.

2.6 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The things that disturb me most about what the Leader of the House and some of his hon. Friends have said is that they appear to believe that we can have democracy on the cheap. If we start from a low base and operate from a legislative slum, we must expect costs to rise rapidly. We must also expect the quality of our democracy to be poor if we do not have the necessary resources. When I hear some Conservative Members say that a few filing cabinets are not used properly, I fear that we are being taken back not to the 19th century but before then.

The Leader of the House has a respect for the House which I understand, accept and encourage. He must remember the aims of the people who inhabited this House in the last century. They were higher than they are today. He should try to match that quality rather than take us back, on the assumption that we can repeat something rather than move with technology.

As is stated by an early-day motion which I and several other hon. Members of all parties tabled a few weeks ago, and which has attracted more than 200 signatures,, for Members who want it, the House should aim for a minimum of one secretary and one researcher and allowance for equipment and accommodation. If we fail to aim for that as a minimum, we shall continue to misuse students and people from companies who are used as professional advisers. Students and advisers are becoming the red herrings of this argument.

A good secretary is worth between £8,000 and £12,000. Taking account of the movement of prices between 1984 and 1985, I pay an amount similar to that recommended by the Top Salaries Review Body for secretaries in the House. I bought a computer, for which I spread the payments over two years to try to keep within my budget — a loan which I had to take out and pay back by monthly instalments from my allowance. I now find—I hope that the Leader of the House is listening carefully, because I and other Members are coming to see him on Monday about the allowance — that, allowing for my secretary's salary for the rest of the year, I must draw from my salary to pay any new expenses until April next year. When the Leader of the House hears me playing a violin outside his flat at 6.30 pm next Monday, I hope that he will be fairly generous.

I have a researcher who works for me voluntarily. He is highly qualified, like my secretary, and would be able to earn a good salary outside if he could get a job. I cannot pay him a salary, although I pay as much as I can towards his expenses in coming here and doing the work. The nonsense is that by the time I have paid for a good secretary—who could earn more outside the House than she gets from me—and for my computer, plus the odds and ends that come up from time to time, I must pay for everything else out of my pocket. That is wrong.

The number of hon. Members employing secretaries increased from 30 per cent. in 1971 to 99 per cent. in 1982, and the number employing research assistants increased from 9 to 58 per cent. during the same period. There is no reason to believe that the problem will go away, and to blame the problems of the House on increasing staff is like blaming unemployment on the unemployed. The hon. Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) said that we cause work by coming here and doing our jobs. If we follow that logic to its conclusion, the first mistake that we all make is to get out of bed in the morning. Obviously, we must cause work when we come here. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Clerks and hon Members had not got out of bed this morning and come here, there would have been no work for anyone. We must remember that the priority of this place is to be a democratic legislature, with the resources to do the job properly.

The Top Salaries Review Body accepted that the secretarial and research allowance should be about £13,650 at mid-1984 prices. I would have wished to quote from that report, but, in view of the time, may I simply ask the Leader of the House to examine the sections dealing with secretaries and their salaries and the allowance for office equipment?

Why will only 200 permanent research assistant passes be issued at any one time? If we aim to have one assistant per Member, we should provide enough passes for that. The legislatures in Australia, Canada, the United States, France and Germany pay their members a decent rate to do the job properly.

I could have said much more on the subject, but the most important thing is for the Leader of the House to live up to our traditions and to ensure that he provides hon. Members with the facilities to do their job properly in the way that they wish, and to maintain the high standards that have been set.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): I kept my brief remarks until near the end of the debate because it was important that as many hon. Members as possible should have an opportunity to speak.

The report with which I am most concerned—the one on information technology — does not deal with information technology. It deals with solving problems for Members and with solving the problem of our increasing caseload. It deals with the problem of our increasing work load in relation to the increase in central Government. Problems have been caused by the additional work that we must do following the introduction of the departmental Committee structure. We have problems with the speed at which things happen and our need to get information quickly. Another problem is the geographical distribution of hon. Members and the fact that our constituents expect to see us regularly, which was not the case in the past. Therefore, although we must spend a great deal of time away from this place, we must still be able to deal with any problems that arise.

The Economist Intelligence Unit produced a report based on a survey conducted among hon. Members at the end of the previous Parliament. Many of those who took part in the survey are no longer Members of the House. Indeed, many of those who entered the House after the last election have considerably more knowledge of and skill in information technology than Members who came in even during the previous Parliament.

The Select Committee decided that there had been a change in conditions and that we should do something about it. We took much wider evidence than appears in the report. We took informal evidence, too. Earlier, someone said that hon. Members must ensure that they have word processors. that can take on the Goverment's word processors. One of our informal evidence sessions included an examination of the information technology system in the Cabinet Office. It is reasonable to ask that hon. Members be similarly or at least as well equipped.

The report made several recommendations, which can be broken down into two parts. First of all, the report was written to be as transparent as possible in terms of finance and in terms of those things we do not know and cannot find out without a pilot. The first stage was the suggestion of a pilot scheme. That will run in conjunction with the planning of the second stage, which is the main scheme.

The main scheme will have to take place in some form or other within the next four years, because the annunciators are running down. They work on the 405-line television standard and the only people making sets to that standard are the Swiss. We cannot buy them in Britain any more. There are various estimates of the cost, but to put a new annunciator into somebody's room where there was none before would cost about £1,000. It is daft to install 1959 technology in 1985. We might as well have the best technology available to us. The report is clear that the House of Commons is not the test bed for anybody's state of the art. What we want is tried and tested hardware and software applied by people who know what they are doing.

An important part of the report is that which deals with management structures for the system. We have not suggested setting up a massive new department in the House. We suggest buying in the talent we need for the length of time we need it, and for no longer. There are two reasons for that, and the first is that we must get the best possible people. The other reason is the sheer problem of accommodation. We do not have the room to set up another department. If every Member who has a secretary located that secretary somewhere in the parliamentary buildings, they would have to double up on desks and work in shifts. There are insufficient desks for all the secretaries of Members.

The other report deals with pressure on Members' accommodation. I was privileged to serve on that Committee as well, and should like to pay tribute to the speeches by my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) and the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd). They complimented the Library staff and if anything they were understating, because we get a far better service than we ought to expect, given the conditions under which we make people work and the kind of salaries that we pay. I cannot compliment them highly enough. We will have convergent technology, because the information technology for Members, and the Library and the telephone system will all come together.

At the moment we are negotiating a new contract for the POLIS system. The present contract had run out and we had to extend it for a year. We worked closely with the Library Sub-Committee and meet jointly with it and the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee. This report is a modest one designed to address a specific problem, and I cannot understand why we are debating it on the Adjournment of the House. We ought to have had a statement from the Leader of the House saying, "This is being implemented tomorrow because the problem is pressing."

One or two aspects of the information technology report need to be explained a little further. My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) and others expressed the need for open-system architecture so that our machines, in our constituencies or wherever they are, can have access to the system. That is not precluded by the report. We have suggested a technical working party to get over those problems. There are one or two other aspects as well. I am grateful for the views of Members' staff as well as the staff of the House. We had evidence from the trade unions and met the secretaries' council on two occasions, and we took on board some of the views they put forward. The most important one is that, until we get the new building and start reconfiguring the accommodation, there is potential for some difficulty, with large numbers of printers concentrated in a small area. We need that flexibility of accommodation to solve the problem.

We cannot have flexibility of accommodation if we do not go ahead with the main scheme. Unless we have an effective electronic mail system and an annunciator system which gives us all the information that we need where we need it, we shall be restricted in the places where we can locate Members and staff. It could especially frustrate the design to get all the Members into the House and all the staff out of it and into the new building. To achieve that objective, it is no good starting to cable this place in four years' time, because phase 1 will be complete. What is more, an electronic mail system does not operate if most people do not have access to it. It does not operate on the basis of a small group. To give us the flexibility of use of the new accommodation as it comes in, we need to make a start now.

That brings me to one or two remarks of the Leader of the House and several other hon. Members. We have been told that there is great demand for public funds. We have been told that much work needs doing and that the money is not available. That is a very dangerous argument coming from any Government. I remind hon. Members that the duty of Back-Bench Members is not strictly that of Government and Opposition. As Members of the House, we have a duty to scrutinise the Government's expenditure. However, the Leader of the House is saying, in effect, "We shall continue to be the Executive and to deny you, the Members of the House, the money for the research assistance and the information technology equipment that will enable you to scrutinise effectively."

A great many hon. Members speak about the need for more research assistants and secretaries. Currently, it costs £150 per square foot per year to accommodate a research assistant or a secretary in the kind of accommodation that we shall be putting up. I contend that by implementing the information technology report we shall reduce the pressure for more researchers. We do not have to reduce it by very many at £150 per square foot per year to pay for the lot three or four times over — to say nothing of the secretaries—and the Leader of the House has not taken that into account when doing his sums for this project.

There are other aspects, and we need to take more evidence. We need more information. We need to talk to the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. He has written to us and wants to talk to us. We shall do that.

As for any detailed consideration of the work to be done in the House, no one needs to tell me about the difficulty of cabling in a building of this description. When I was an apprentice, I lost a cable in the middle of a five-foot thick wall in the National Library of Scotland. That taught me two lessons. The first is not to lose cables. The other is that my vocabulary was extended quite a lot when the foreman discovered what had happened. I know the difficulties involved, but that is what the technical working party is about. There is no case for Members of Parliament, who are not qualified, to sit around talking about how we get over the technical problems of cabling the building.

I have seen the way that the cabling was done in the Canadian Parliament building. It is a very similar building to the Palace of Westminster. The layout of the adjoining buildings is similar to the layout of our own outbuildings. The problems are the same. In Canada, it has been managed very elegantly.

Finally, I pay tribute to the marvellous contribution to the debate of the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd). All the members of my Committee have given me great support, and I am very grateful to them. The Leader of the House cannot say that money is not available for the pilot scheme. The new telephone exchange was estimated to cost £2·25 million. We got it for just over £2 million. There is enough money left in the kitty to pay for the information technology pilot scheme. It could be started now. I do not understand why the Leader of the House will not authorise it. All I can suggest is that it is because the Treasury has told him that it wants £250,000 back from the House of Commons.

Mr. Biffen: I have restricted my reply to five minutes, not out of disrespect for the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) but out of the belief that this is an occasion when the House will wish to participate as widely as possible in a debate about this building and its arrangements.

I have been asked to provide two figures. First, on the significance of Select Committees and their cost to Parliament, I understand that it is between 1 and 1·5 per cent. of the total cost of running Parliament, exclusive of the salaries and allowances of hon. Members. Secondly, the cost of Parliament is rising at about double the rate of the rise in the retail price index. The figures will be placed on the record because they are of general interest. I shall see what can be done by way of a written answer.

The debate has ranged widely and has been a very good blood-letting circumstance. Reference was made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) to a point that is not dealt with in the two reports, namely, the value of secretarial and research assistance. I understand that the hon. Member is to see me on Monday evening. I look forward to that fraternal occasion, so perhaps we may reserve the further exchange of pleasantries until then.

At the heart of our interest in the information technology report is our belief that the construction of the Bridge street site will provide Members of Parliament with an opportunity to repossess the Palace of Westminster. It is a considerable ambition and has to be related to projections of expenditure and of the budget of the Property Services Agency. I noticed that the hon. Member for Blaydon was keen to regale us with tales from his youth as an apprentice electrician. Had he been an apprentice accountant or an apprentice book-keeper, he would have known that he could not be quite so lighthearted about the financial implications of the proposals. Hon. Members must look for evolutionary change, a point that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), and try to achieve as broad a consensus as possible.

As for research assistants, the debate demonstrated that there is no such thing as an average Member of Parliament. It is an abstract concept. We have the combined experience of 650 people who adopt completely different approaches to work and completely different attitudes to what constitutes good parliamentary tactics. There needs, therefore, to be a measure of understanding so that what is deemed to be essential for one hon. Member does not necessarily impinge upon another who does not particularly want to use these particular adjuncts and aids.

I recognise the limitations of an Adjournment motion, but the question of research assistants is one where conditionality already exists. We are not talking in absolutes; we are talking about redefining the conditionality that attaches to research assistance. So I thought that there was some merit in having a debate to discover whether anything further could be taken into account before resolutions are put to the House to deal with the problem that has been so helpfully addressed by the Committee under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin). I hope that I can atone for any lassitude in these matters by saying that we can come back to the House, with a view to taking some decisions, in the reasonably near future.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

DHSS Offices (Islington)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I wish to raise the subject of the conditions for public and staff in local Department of Health and Social Security offices serving the London borough of Islington.

The House has spent much time today discussing the difficult and inadequate conditions that hon. Members have to endure in doing their job. The subject of this debate is even graver, because it concerns the conditions that members of the public and hard working members of staff in the DHSS have to endure in carrying out their tasks.

I shall concentrate on conditions in the Tavistock square office of the DHSS, which are particularly bad. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) will speak about conditions at Archway tower where a claimant armed with an air rifle recently attempted to attack another claimant. The rifle was later found in the toilets and the circumstances that enabled that incident to occur have caused considerable alarm to members of staff, especially in the light of what happened at the Westminster office of the DHSS recently.

About a month ago I received a letter from a constituent who was nearly 40 weeks pregnant and was claiming supplementary benefit and a maternity grant. She wrote:

"I went to the DHSS again on 31st May 1985 a Friday. I waited to be seen all day. I was there at 9.30 am waiting for the door to be open and stayed there until 3.45 pm. At 1 pm I was told I might as well go out for 1 hour get something to eat and find a toilet. I did this and returned at 2 pm. At 3.45 pm I was told that they had not been able to find my file and that I should return on Monday.

On Monday 3rd June 1985 I went to DHSS at 11 am, after a hospital appointment. At about 2.30 pm I was told that they had found my file and that someone would see me which happened about 3 pm. I was told I would receive a giro the next day. By this time because I had not been paid for the period before 24th May 1985 I had no money not even the bus fare and I had only been able to afford a cup of tea all day. I asked for payment that day and about my maternity grant. I was told that I could wait and get my giro and that the grant would be sorted out. I got the giro at 5.20 pm and just managed to cash it."

That was a disgraceful way to treat a woman who was nearly 40 weeks pregnant. The tragedy that she endured is repeated many times over for many of my constituents at the hands of local DHSS offices. I hasten to say that it is not the fault of the staff in those offices; it is the fault of the conditions that they and the public have to tolerate and the facilities that are available.

At the Tavistock square office there is seating on hard wooden benches for 50 people in the public waiting area, which is a small and dingy room. On most days there are far more than 50 people waiting. Many have to stand and some have to wait outside. The conditions in the waiting room are appalling. I sat there for half a morning to observe what happened and the conditions that people had to endure. I was lucky—I could go away. I am paid at the end of the month. The conditions endured by people who depend upon DHSS assistance are appalling.

The gross overcrowding is made worse by the fact that there is no privacy in many of the interviewing cubicles. The acoustic qualities of the screens are so poor that people have to shout to be heard by the officers. The private details of their medical, social and family circumstances are broadcast to the world.

Even worse is the fact that people waiting in that office have no toilet facilities. If she is lucky, a woman is allowed to use the staff facilities behind the counter. A man is told to use the car park at the back. In 1985 such conditions should not be imposed on citizens seeking their rights from a Department.

Staff conditions are not much better. In 1982, 66 staff were working in the Tavistock office; there are now 92. In 1982, the 66 staff had just about enough room to operate satisfactorily. In 1985, with 92 staff, the staff space is grossly overcrowded. In addition to those staff who form part of the complement of officers at the DHSS office, there are regional reserves and detached duty staff. Because of the enormously heavy work load of the office, many of those people work there regularly. The already overcrowded conditions are thereby made worse.

There is no proper ventilation system for staff. Some years ago, double glazing was installed to cut out the enormous traffic noise from the busy corner on which the office stood. The ventilation system, which was first requested by the trade unions seven years ago, was supposed to be installed in June this year. There is still no sign of it. The recent hot weather makes life even worse for the staff trying to operate in such overcrowded and hot conditions.

Next year, computers are supposed to arrive. New technology is to be installed. This will take up a lot of space and, at the moment, there is no space in which to put that equipment. The result is an incredibly low level of morale among staff, frayed tempers and a reduced ability to deal with the public's problems. There is a high turnover of staff, especially of clerical officers who do much of the most important work in the office. In the past six months nearly 20 clerical officers have left the office.

It is clear that the conditions that the public and staff have to tolerate are a disgrace. Several years ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) raised this matter with the Department. Nothing has been done. Better facilities are desperately needed for that office, and I suspect the same is true of other offices throughout the country. There have been some half-hearted attempts to improve matters. It is proposed—this has not yet been implemented—that board and lodging payment matters should be hived off to a separate office dealing only with them. The management at Tavistock square has asked the authorities to grab some scattered rooms from other organisations elsewhere in the building. Those are not sufficient answers to the major problem caused by the lack of facilities and space available to people who have to work in or claim from that office.

The Department should be able to give some help to the many hundreds of people who have to put up with the conditions. The Government must provide resources to make the facilities better and tolerably decent.

An attempt has been made to tart up the waiting area at Tavistock square. A splash or two of paint has been put on the walls and some new tiling placed there. Appropriately, they depict scenes from Dickens. Nothing could sum up better the Government's attitude in refusing to allow anything other than Dickensian conditions for the public and the staff at that office.

I plead with the Government to show some concern about the facilities, the conditions, the space, the dirt, filth and degradation that people have to put up with at Tavistock square. I plead with the Government to provide better facilities and to make that office a decent place so that people may go there, not as supplicants, not as Dickensian waifs, but as people who deserve to claim their rights in decent and tolerable conditions. I hope that the Government will show that concern and make a commitment this afternoon.

2.43 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I thank my good Friend the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) for allowing me to take part in the debate. He represents the southern part of the borough and I represent the north. I am in regular contact with claimants' organisations, welfare rights organisations and the trade union involved in the administration of a large social security office at Archway tower, where most of my constituents go, although some go to the office in Hackney. Archway tower is a huge building. The best that one can say about it is that the view from the staff canteen on the top floor is probably the best in London. What one can say about the rest of the building is not so complimentary.

About 34,000 claimants use Archway tower from the Finsbury park and Highgate offices. Only 400 staff handle that work. The building is leased and not owned by the DHSS. It is a tall, 15-floor building with serious structural problems. One is that it contains a large amount of asbestos. This has been removed from the public and waiting areas, and a system of identification of asbestos panels throughout the building has been agreed with the trade unions. I hope that all the asbestos will be removed. Can the Minister say when it will be removed, and whether he and the DHSS are satisfied with the presence of such a large amount of asbestos in a sealed building?

The windows are also causing a problem. The DHSS and the owners of the freehold are in dispute, and the windows have not been cleaned for some time. However, a window cleaning cradle has been erected and I hope that the cleaning will begin. In the meantime, staff are in difficulties because they cannot see out of the windows by their desks.

Staffing levels in the building need serious examination. A large amount of overtime is worked, and a large number of casual workers are employed, which has led to disquiet among the staff. This is an area of high unemployment—about 25 per cent. of workers in my constituency are unemployed — and to allow staff shortages is inexcusable. Such a large amount of overtime and taking on casual staff with no future are equally inexcusable. The DHSS must review the staffing position to take account of the increasing demands on that building. The trade unions have made numerous representations about this matter, as there is a great deal of staff disquiet.

There are other problems, such as the appalling problems of queueing and waiting within the building. There have been demonstrations by claimants, by unions and by other people because of the frustration over the queueing. A constituent phoned me at the House only 10 minutes ago to say that when she went to claim her housing benefit this morning 40 people had been waiting for an hour or more because there were only two staff on duty in that section. She was not critical of the staff — she complimented them—but she wanted to point out the problem.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said, there is also the problem of reception areas in DHSS offices. The problems that he described in his constituency apply to the office in Archway tower. We are looking for an understanding of the fact that people who use Archway tower regularly do not like queueing outside, or even inside, and the atmosphere of hostility that is being engendered between claimants and staff in the DHSS. This atmosphere is created by the Government's underfunding of the DHSS and by the fact that they do not recognise the serious problems consistently faced in inner-city areas, with the growth of unemployment and a great many claimants.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury has pointed out, the atmosphere of trust that needs to be developed between claimants and staff of the DHSS cannot be developed while there are inadequate facilities and overworked, underpaid and often ill-trained staff trying to deal with people who are justifiably angry and frustrated at the inadequacy of the benefits which many of them receive and the poverty in which they are forced to live.

I hope that the Minister will seriously consider our points about the offices in Islington. Perhaps he will visit them himself and join the queues to see what the offices are like. He may then agree to provide extra staff and more and better facilities, such as toilets, telephones and so on, which will make life a little more tolerable for some of the worst off in our society.

2.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am glad to be able to respond to this debate. I seem to make a habit of responding to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), whether on another of our interests, foreign affairs, or now, on social security. Not infrequently, he is accompanied by his colleague the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

Mr. Corbyn: We go together.

Mr. Whitney: Yes, the two hon. Members go together. I am tempted to make other comparisons, but I shall not.

Both hon. Members have raised important points about staff conditions and conditions for claimants. I am happy to respond to the points that they have made, not least because, since I had the privilege of joining the Department of Health and Social Security, I have started a campaign of working my way around the 500-odd local DHSS offices.

I have been impressed by the quality of the staff, the dedication they show and the understanding they have of the extremely complex system that has grown up over the past 40 years in the administration of our social security system. I am optimistic that the reforms proposed in the review published by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services on 3 June will lead to improvements in the conditions for staff and will make the system more simple over the next two or three years. That will be good for the staff and good for the claimants.

The impact that we have achieved over the past two or three years in improving our services to the public has been marked. This has been a priority sector for the work of the DHSS in recent years. The results can be seen. I do not deny that there are problems at the offices to which the hon. Gentlemen referred. I ask them to accept that there is a strong thrust in the DHSS's policies towards achieving improvements in conditions for the staff and claimants and for the delivery of our enormous social security programme which will amount to £42 billion a year, after the November uprating.

It is ludicrous for the hon. Member for Islington, North to denigrate the social security programme. That was completely unjustified. He fails to recognise what the Government have achieved by providing increases in the social security programme above the rate of inflation and in addition to the impact caused by the unemployment figures. It does no service to the case that the hon. Gentlemen are putting to the House to ignore those facts.

I have not yet been to the local offices to which the hon. Gentlemen referred. I have a long-standing engagement to visit the Bloomsbury office. I hope that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury does not think that it was fixed to coincide with this Adjournment debate, because that is not the case. I have been to the Hoxton office, which I hope will be familiar to the hon. Gentlemen. I was very impressed by what I found there. They will be better aware than I am that it is an area with social problems. The service which the Hoxton office delivers is an example of what can be done by local DHSS offices. I have a number of friends who have spoken highly of the service that they receive from that local office.

Difficulties have been experienced at the two local offices that we have been discussing. Today, we have focused more on the Tavistock square, Bloomsbury office. I do not quarrel with many of the points made by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury about overcrowding and the lack of facilities. We are conscious of them, and we are doing what we can to improve them. He should understand how the pressures on the services have exploded during the past two years. The supplementary benefit case load has virtually doubled over three years. No public service can normally be expected to respond to that pressure, because, as I am sure he accepts in his more charitable moments, buying and selling property in central London creates serious problems. The high volatility of the case load is one thing, but the use of social security resources, be they for benefits or real estate, must be planned over a longer period.

We accept that changes are necessary and some have been achieved. The hon. Gentleman dismissed uncharitably—somewhat uncharacteristically—what has been achieved. We have spent about £40,000 recently improving the area used by claimants. The area occupied by the interviewing booths has been increased by 213 sq ft. I have details of the achievements which that expenditure has produced already.

The fundamental difficulty has been created by the increased case load. In 1982, for example, there were fewer than 5,000 claimants and this year there are more than 9,000. Despite the improvements that we have made in accommodation for members of the public, the premises are not large enough to deal with the present caller load. We hope that during the next 12 months it will be possible for us to acquire more space in the building, provide a better service for the public and better conditions for the staff.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury referred to the treatment of a pregnant lady. I understand that the local office manager is making inquiries into the hon. Gentleman's allegations. He will report to me and either he or I will let the hon. Gentleman know about the detail which has been found. It is true that there are currently no toilet facilities at the office but it is normal office practice for pregnant women, the elderly and the infirm to use the staff facilities that are available. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the way in which a certain pregnant lady was treated is typical of the way in which the public are treated at the office. That I firmly reject.

The staff work hard within the facilities that are available to ensure that people such as the pregnant lady to which the hon. Gentleman referred are given special and favoured treatment to the extent that that is possible. It is of benefit to no one to exaggerate as the hon. Gentleman did. I understand that, when he visited the office in February, he was not dissatisfied with the efforts that were being made and the situation which he found. We both agree that under the present new case load the premises are insufficient.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Minister referred to one of my visits to the office, during which I met a number of members of the management staff. I was not dissatisfied with their desire to improve matters. They concurred with me when I identified one of the problems as the hierarchy of the DHSS beyond them not providing sufficient resources and not being determined to improve matters.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman must take account of the fact that the overall budget of the social security programme has increased in real terms as I have described. Since 1979, it has increased in real terms by 30 per cent. and that cannot be gainsaid. The improvements that we have achieved at the Bloomsbury office within a tight structural framework are important. We hope and intend that in the months to come there will be still further improvements.

The staff are operating under great pressure. Many in Government service are, and that is undeniable. We have increased the staffing complement and the staff in post is at a level that is significantly above the agreed complement. That is not to say that I do not recognise that the staff are working under great pressure.

We have good service from our staff and we are making great efforts to continue to improve conditions for claimants. I refer the hon. Members for Islington, North and for Islington, South and Finsbury to the remarkable improvements that have been made since the Labour Government left office in 1979. The fundamental conclusion that we must all draw is that there is an absolute need to simplify, streamline and bring up to date our social security system. That is precisely the thrust of the reforms proposed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. That is what will be achieved by the continued and improved computerisation programme. We hope that the new mainframe local office computers will be in operation in the next three or four years. That will do great things for the staff and claimants in the social security system.

The Question having been proposed after half-past Two o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Summer Recess

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Lord Privy Seal how many times Parliament has risen for the summer recess on or after 1 August since 1955; and if he will give the years in question, with the date the House rose.

Mr. Biffen: The House of Commons has risen on or after 1 August 15 times since 1955. The dates are as follows:

2 August 1956
2 August 1957
1 August 1958
4 August 1961
3 August 1962
2 August 1963
5 August 1965
12 August 1966
3 August 1971
9 August 1972
7 August 1975
6 August 1976
3 August 1978

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

CLOFT Scheme

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, following the refusal of the EC to accept the CLOFT scheme for assistance to the clothing, footwear and textile industries, what steps he is taking to help these industries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has a wide range of schemes currently available to assist the development of industry, including the clothing, footwear and textile industries. These schemes have recently been repackaged and a copy of the brochure "Support for Business" was deposited in the House of Commons Library. The clothing, footwear and textile industries have also made proposals which are currently being considered by the Department.

Footwear and Leather Industries

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to assist the footwear and leather industries to adopt new technology; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: As regards the footwear industry I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 1 July 1985. The Government have provided £1·1 million in assistance over the last two complete financial years under the Science and Technology Act to help the Shoe and Allied Trades Research Association (SATRA) undertake programmes of benefit to this industry, particularly in areas of application of new technology. The Government have similarly provided £456,000 to the research wing of the British Leather Confederation (BLC).

Telephones

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he will now ensure that all public telephone operators display notices explaining how coinbox telephones can be used by people with hearing aids;

(2) whether he will now ensure that all public telephone operators fitting Statesman telephones ensure that the models can be used by those wearing hearing aids; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The obligations required of licensed telecommunications operators are matters which are the responsibility of the Director General of Telecommunications. I am drawing the hon. Member's questions to his attention with the request that he write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will now publish the code of practice for the magnetic coupling of telephones to hearing aids prepared by the working group on telecommunications for the hearing-impaired and issued to members on 31 May; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The code of practice is a useful guide for telephone designers and hearing aid designers. I am grateful for the efforts put in to it by the working group. The Office of Telecommunications is arranging for the code of practice to be published shortly.

Ford Motor Company

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive appropriate undertakings from the Ford Motor Company following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report, Cmnd. 9437.

Mr. Fletcher: I shall make a statement on the position when discussions with Ford are concluded.

Mechanical Engineering Products

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the average value per tonne of total United Kingdom imports of mechanical engineering products; and what information he has as to how this figure compares with the average value per tonne of total imports of mechanical engineering products into France, West Germany, Italy and Sweden in the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1983.

(2) what was the average value per tonne of total United Kingdom exports of mechanical engineering products; and what information he has as to how this figure compares with the average value per tonne of total exports of mechanical engineering products from France, West Germany, Italy and Sweden in the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1983.

Mr. Fletcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Information Technology Centre 6502, Manchester

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will explain his reasons for his decision to withdraw industrial support funding from the information technology centre 6502 in Moss Side, Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As with all information technology centres, Moss Side 6502 has been eligible for pump-priming support of £75,000 over a period of 3 years. The extent of the support was made clear at the outset of th ITEC programme in 1983 and all ITECs have been encouraged to engage in commercial activities to ensure sufficient funding after the support is exhausted. I understand that in the case of Moss Side 6502 the £75.000 has been taken up.

Copyright

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what action Her Majesty's Government will take to ensure that the United States Government comply with the general agreement on tariffs and trade ruling of March 1984 which determined that the manufacturing clause in the United States Copyright Act infringed the general agreement on tariffs and trade;

(2) what response he has received, as a signatory of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, from the United States Government concerning the general agreement on tariffs and trade's ruling of March 1984 which determined that the manufacturing clause in the United States Copyright Act infringed the general agreement on tariffs and trade;

(3) what assurances have been received by Her Majesty's Government that the manufacturing clause in the United States Copyright Act will lapse in 1986.

Mr. Fletcher: The United States Administration have assured GATT members that they intend to conform to the ruling which condemned this legislation, and to amend United States law accordingly. A ruling accepted by the contracting parties to the GATT is binding in international law. The offending United States law is due to expire in June 1986. My right hon. Friend has every confidence that the United States Government will honour their international obligations. We will continue, through the European Commission, to remind the United States Government of our continuing concern about this matter, and to press for early action.

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to refuse to allow imports of publications printed in countries whose Governments take no action against publishers and printers who pirate British copyright publications.

Mr. Butcher: United Kingdom obligations under the GATT only permit restrictions on imports which themselves threaten United Kingdom commercial or public interests. Accordingly, United Kingdom copyright legislation enables the importation of infringing printed copies of literary, dramatic and musical works to be prevented. The Government none the less pursues all available opportunities to encourage suppression of piracy and adherence to the international copyright conventions. It participates fully in initiatives to this end within the European Community and the Council of Europe.

"Britain Means Business"

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many activities have so far been held under the "Britain Means Business" campaign; where and when they were held; by whom they were sponsored; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The "British Means Business" campaign was launched on 1 April 1985 and a series of activities will take place to the end of 1985. These include overseas 'Briefing on Britain' seminars, visits to the United kingdom by United States and Japanese journalists and the publication of a quarterly magazine directed at prospective investors overseas.

There have been two 'Briefing on Britain' events held so far. Th first was held in Tokyo on 4 June and was co-sponsored by Midland Bank plc and Price Waterhouse & Co. The second event was held in Hartford, Connecticut on 26 June and was co-sponsored by the National Westminster Bank plc. Ministers were the principal speakers at both events. The Peterborough Development Corporation has held a successful seminar in Boston, on 19 June, using the "Britain Means Business" logo.

Three United States and four Japanese journalists have also visited the United Kingdom and two of the quarterly magazines have been published.

It is still relatively early days in the campaign's programme of events. I and the co-sponsors have been very pleased by the size and quality of the audiences attending the seminars held so far and by the interest which has been shown in investing in the United Kingdom. The "Britain Means Business" events play an important part in realising the campaign's objective of achieving maximum success and benefit for the United Kingdom by co-ordinating promotional efforts of the relevant public sector inward investment bodies and the private sector to project an effective, united image of Britain overseas.

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money he has made available to "Britain Means Business"; and for how long.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has allocated £1 million, additional to the Invest in Britain bureau's normal promotional budget for 1985-86, to the "Britain Means Business" campaign. Substantial contributions to the campaign, both 'in kind' and financial, are being made by the territorial and regional promotional organisations and the private sector.

The campaign began on 1 April 1985 and will run to the end of the calendar year.

Computer Software

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his current assessment of the share which the domestic software industry has of the national market in the United Kingdom; and what equivalent information he has about the share of the national markets taken by the respective domestic markets in France, Italy and Germany.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many jobs have been created by the loan guarantee scheme; and what is the average cost of each job created.

Mr. Trippier: Information from sample surveys carried out by my Department suggests that loan guarantees authorised up to 31 May 1984 assisted the creation of about 44,500 jobs at a cost after taking account of estimated failure rates of approximately £2,200 per job. These figures do not allow for possible displacement of jobs elsewhere in the economy.

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the average failure rate among firms which have received support from the loan guarantee scheme; and how these figures compare with the average failure rate of small businesses in general.

Mr. Trippier: About one in three of all firms are estimated to fail within their first three years of existence. The failure rate at the end of three years on guaranteed loans authorised between June 1981 and May 1982 was approximately 40 per cent. Subsequent loans have not yet run for three years. Available figures suggest a reduction in failure rates in the later period but this cannot yet be reliably quantified.

Anti-Dumping Levies

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he has given to an application to apply general agreement on tariffs and trade anti-dumping levies to Japanese computer and component firms.

Mr. Fletcher: Responsibility for anti-dumping action under GATT on behalf of EC member states rests with the EC Commission. We have not been informed of any request for such action against imports of Japanese computers and computer components, but if the United Kingdom industry believes that it is being damaged by such dumped imports, we would press the Commission to give any request urgent and sympathetic consideration.

British Telecom

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) pursuant to the answer of 27 June, Official Report, column 443, how many shares Rudolf Wolff and Co. undertook to buy its role as underwriters to the flotation of British Telecommunications; and what happened to the shares it handled.

(2) pursuant to the answer of 27 June, Official Report, column 443, when the applications by employees of an eligible fund based overseas for 31,900 British Telecommunications shares were discovered; what arrangements were made for the surrender of their profits to charity; which charities were involved and on what dates payments were made to them; if any investigations into possible fraud or deception were carried out; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER

Herbicide 2,4,5,-T

Mr. Nellist asked the Prime Minister if she will ensure that the Advisory Committee on Pesticides reconsiders the safety of 2,4,5,-T when the Health and Safety Executive has completed its report on the case of Ms. Anna Noon; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: the Advisory Committee on Pesticides carried out full-scale reviews of the safety of 2,4,5,-T herbicides in 1979, 1980 and 1982. On each occasion its advice was that formulations of 2,4,5,-T cleared under the pesticides safety precautions scheme were safe for use as recommended. The Government accepted that advice. The committee continues to examine all important evidence on the safety of 2,4,5,-T herbicides.

A report of the Health and Safety Executive's investigations of the case of Ms. Anna Noon will be made to the committee.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

Mr. Latham askd the Prime Minister whether the Government have received any request from King Hussein for United Kingdom Ministers to meet the deputation of Jordanians and Palestinians currently visiting Italy and France; and whether Her Majesty's Government will make clear that their policy regarding ministerial contact with representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organisation remains unchanged.

The Prime Minister: The Italian and French Governments received a joint Jordanian Palestinian delegation in late June at the request of King Hussein. We ourselves are in close touch with King Hussein and are examining how best we can support his courageous efforts to move towards peace negotiations. As is well known, contacts at ministerial level with the PLO remain difficult while PLO attitudes on Israel's right to exist and on the use of violence remain ambiguous.

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Hickmet asked the Prime Minister what improvements the Government have made in the circumstances of retirement pensioners since 1979.

The Prime Minister: The Government's pledge to protect the value of retirement pensions has been fully honoured. When the new rates announced on 18 June by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services come into force in November 1985, the pension will have risen by 96·4 per cent. since November 1978, some ten percentage points more than the expected rise in prices over the same period.

The method of uprating pensions has been changed so that increases are now based on the actual rate of inflation rather than on uncertain forecasts of price changes.

The pensioners' earnings rule has been increased to £70 a week and will be further increased to £75 a week in November.

The capital limit for supplementary benefit was raised to £3,000 in November 1983, the capital limit for single payments was raised to £500 and the first £1,500 of the surrender valie of life assurance policies is now disregarded in relation to supplementary benefit entitlement: all of which help pensioners with savings.

Help with heating costs reached an estimated level of £400 million in 1984-85, about £140 million more in real terms than under the last Labour Government. Over 90 per cent. of supplementary pensioners now receive a heating addition.

The Christmas bonus has been made a permanent statutory entitlement.

In November 1984 the residence test for the non-contributory over-80's pension was relaxed so that the 10 years' residence test could be completed after age 80, enabling people who returned to this country from abroad after age 70 to qualify for the pension.

We have taken steps to ensure that from November 1985 married women over 80 who qualify for the non-contributory pension will receive it at the full rate instead of a reduced rate.

We have abolished the residual effects of the married women's half-test with effect from December 1984, enabling 25,000 married women who reached age 60 before April 1979 to receive a pension on their own contributions.

Finally, the Government's most important achievement for pensioners — and for all those living on fixed incomes—has been to bring down the rate of inflation and to keep it in single figures for four succesive years.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to seek to encourage (a) the making available of defence and nuclear robotic research to those wishing to produce sophisticated aids for the disabled and (b) the making available of research regarding aids for the disabled, using light-weight and low-cost materials, to those exploring defence and nuclear robotic possibilities.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is responsible for reporting each year to Parliament progress made on research and development work carried out on behalf of every Minister of the Crown which might be of assistance to the disabled. The inquiries made by his Department seek to identify all such useful work, including that arising from defence. These inquiries have not included the nuclear field. I am grateful for the suggestion of a further source of information.

The Department of Health and Social Security has sought to increase the effectiveness of this report by commissioning a study last year by the disabilities study unit in addition to its own inquiries. The report of the unit is being studied. First indications are that few developments have been revealed of which the DHSS was previously unaware. The project has clearly been useful in providing a further stimulus to research establishments to consider the need for the disabled.

Research regarding aids for the disabled is not subject to secrecy except where commercial confidentiality applies and information is therefore available through a wide range of publications concerning this area, as well as in the report made under section 22 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970.

WALES

Incontinence Laundries

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to which health authorities in Wales have arrangements for providing an incontinence laundry service for the use of patients in the community.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is not held centrally.

Geriatric Medicine (Specialists)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide financial assistance to the East Dyfed health authority to appoint additional specialists in geriatric medicine commensurate with the large geographic area and dispersed communities as highlighted in the report of the joint hospital advisory services and social work service published on 7 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 25 June at col. 359. East Dyfed has approval from the All-Wales Manpower Committee for a consultant post in geriatrics. Central funds for the consultant expension programme in 1985-86 have already been allocated. It is open to the authority to make a bid against such monies as might be available for the programme in 1986-87.

Farm Grants (Brecon and Radnor)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of farmers in the parliamentary constituency of Brecon and Radnor who have (a) applied for grant under the variable beef premium scheme and (b) have had their application granted in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Payments to Welsh producers under the beef variable premium scheme are as follows:

Marketing year	Number of animals certified (Wales)	Total premium paid (£ million)
1980-81	110,659	4·2
1981-82	91,070	0·42
1982-83	98,756	1·61
1983-84	116,221	4·9
1984-85	121,124	4·67

Separate figures for the parliamentary constituency of Brecon and Radnor and for the number of individual producers involved are not available.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of farmers in the parliamentary constituency of Brecon and Radnor who have (a) applied for grant or subsidy and (b) received grant or subsidy under the European Economic Community sheepmeat regime in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Payments to Welsh producers under the EC sheepmeat regime are as follows:

1. Sheep variable premium scheme

Marketing year	Number of animals certified (Wales)	Total premium paid (£ million)
1980-81	2,298,190	7·5
1981-82	2,383,307	12·6
1982-83	2,489,969	25·4
1983-84	2,564,454	30·5
1984-85	2,676,859	21·4

2. Sheep annual premium scheme

Marketing year	Number of claims paid	Total paid (£ million)
1980-81	15,655	2·5
1981-82	15,665	5·2
1982-83	15,583	10·3
1983-84	15,586	26·3
1984-85*	11,954	6·1

* To 31 May 1985

Separate figures for the parliamentary constituency of Brecon and Radnor and for the number of individual producers are not available.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Community Radio

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement about the development of community radio.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is yet ready to announce his plans for development of community radio; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to make a further statement before the recess.

Penal Establishments (Medical Services)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what happens when a penal establishment exhausts its allocation for medical services.

Mr. Mellor: Establishments are expected to keep within their financial allocation subject to the requirement to maintain a proper standard of health care. There is no question of patients being denied essential treatment, and the re-allocation of provision within the voted resources of the prison service is considered if the need arises.

Escort Duties (Cost)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average cost of escort duties involved in taking a prisoner from a local prison to a Crown court on one occasion.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available.

Bail

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown of the main reasons given for refusal of bail.

Mr. Mellor: Such information is not collected routinely but details of the grounds for refusal of bail by magistrates' courts in the period May to October 1978 are contained in Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1979 (paragraph 8.8 and tables 8.9 and 8.10).

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the total number of bail beds available in England and Wales, the location of the bail hostels and percentage occupancy in 1984;

(2) what is the average cost of a bail bed; and what is the average cost of a prison remand place.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to his question on 27 June at column 453.

Brecon and Radnor

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many additional electors in the Brecon and Radnor constituency, presently ineligible to vote through absence on holiday and other causes, he estimates will be enfranchised by recent legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: It is estimated that throughout Great Britain over two million people, or 5 per cent. of those registered as electors, would at present be disfranchised through absence on holiday at a parliamentary general election held during July. The proportion may vary from one constituency to another, but clearly a substantial number of electors who will be unable to vote in person at the Brecon and Radnor by-election would be able to vote by post or proxy under the provisions of the Representation of the People Bill.

Justices of the Peace Act 1361

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons in England and Wales have been arrested, how many charged and how many convicted under the Justices of the Peace Act 1361 in each of the last five years; and how many of these arrests and charges related to domestic disputes.

Mr. Mellor: Proceedings under the Justices of the Peace Act 1361 provide for persons who have been arrested for an alleged breach of the peace (which is not an offence in itself) to be brought before a magistrate's court with a view to being bound over to keep the peace. The information collected centrally relates to the number of applications made and the outcome: details of the circumstances leading to the arrest are not collected centrally. The available information, which may be incomplete, is shown in the table. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Proceedings under the Justices of the Peace Act 1361 to find surety to keep the peace or for good behaviour.

England and Wales Number of Applications

Year	Applications
	Total	Order made	No Order made
1980	87,780	80,443	7,337
1981	92,594	84,832	7,762
1982	104,148	97,041	7,107
1983	102,996	96,113	6,883

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend the Justices of the Peace Act 1361; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans for such legislation at present. The Law Commission is considering the power to bind over to keep the peace, and hopes to publish a working paper with provisional proposals for reform in the course of next year.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the average length of time for which a person charged under the Justices of the Peace Act 1361 is held before being brought before a magistrate.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No information is held centrally about the length of time for which persons who are bound over to keep the peace have been detained before being brought before a magistrate.

Prisoners (Money)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what moneys a prisoner on home leave is allowed to take with him; and what is the source of these moneys.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

A. Payments from Public Funds

1. Travelling Costs: the prisoner receives either a travel warrant or the cost of fares for the return journey.

2. Subsistence: a subsistence allowance for the duration of the outward and return journey is paid in accordance with the following rates:

2- 5 hours	£1·00
5-10 hours	£2·40
10-16 hours	£4·40
16-24 hours	£5·60

A packed meal may be provided for the outward journey. If so no allowance for the outward journey will be paid.

3. Householder's Allowance: in cases where leave has been approved and the prisoner is to spend leave in the home of a householder who is known to lack the resources to keep the prisoner for the period of leave and is not receiving supplementary benefit from the DHSS, an allowance of £5·00 for short home leave or pre-parole leave or £10·00 for terminal home leave may be paid to the prisoner when proceeding on leave.

4. Lodgings Allowance: where a prisoner has no suitable accommodation for his leave, arrangements may be made for the prisoner to stay at a suitable hostel or lodgings. If so, expenditure may be incurred to meet the cost of accommodation and meals. The maximum amounts which prison governors may authorise are £21·00 for short home leave or pre-parole leave and £41·00 for terminal home leave. Normally these payments would be made direct to the hostel or lodgings and the prisoner would not be given this money when he proceeds on leave.

B. Prisoners' Monies

1. The maximum amount in earnings and private cash which a prisoner may take on leave is £20·00* for terminal home leave or £10·00* for short home leave.

2. Additional sums of private cash may be sent home in advance of leave, subject to an annual limit of £95·00.

* (Includes a sum of £4·00 for terminal home leave and £2·00 for short home leave or pre-parole leave which the prisoner must have saved from earnings before being allowed to take leave. Where prisoners have already taken short home leave and are to take terminal home leave they must save £2·00 before leave may be taken.)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what moneys a prisoner may bring back into prison after home leave; and what rules govern the bringing in of moneys at this time.

Mr. Mellor: There are no restrictions on the amount of money which a prisoner may bring back into prison after home leave. The money will be credited to his private cash account in the books of the prison in accordance with prison rule 41(3). Prisoners who have large sums of money in their cash account are encouraged to open accounts with the National Savings Bank or similar institutions.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what wages a prisoner on home leave loses during this period or following his period of home leave.

Mr. Mellor: No wages are paid to adult prisoners during absence on home leave. On return from such leave it is normal practice for prisoners to re-join their work party and they therefore usually suffer no loss of earnings.

Racial Discrimination

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many employers were prosecuted for discrimination under the Race Relations Act (a) between 1976 and 1979 and (b) between 1979 and 1984;

(2) how many employers were prosecuted under the Sex Discrimination Act (a) between 1975 and 1979 and (b) between 1979 and 1985.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many registered class A drug addicts there were in Basildon in the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to his question on 11 January at columns 559-60. The only information which has since become available is the provisional figures for new addicts notified in the Essex police force area in 1984, given in the reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 11 June 1985 at columns 394-95.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the totals of the registered number of addicts in England and Wales addicted to (a) heroin and (b) cocaine, broken down by regional health authority areas for the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 24 June 1985, c. 287]: The available information about the number of drug addicts notified as addicted to heroin or cocaine relates to police forces areas and is given in the following tables for the years 1980 to 1983. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available. However, provisional figures for all new addicts notified in 1984 by police force area were given in the reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 11 June 1985 at columns 394-95.

Drug Trafficking

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons in Great Britain have been charged with drug trafficking offences in 1984-85.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information relates to 1983, when 3,919 persons were proceeded against for trafficking in controlled drugs (unlawful production of drugs other than cannabis, unlawful supply, possession with intent to supply unlawfully, and unlawful import or export).

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what current proposals regarding a convention on extradition proceedings for drug trafficking are currently being discussed by the United Nations.

Mr. Mellor: The United Kingdom is firmly supporting efforts to draw up a new United Nations convention to deal with all aspects of drug trafficking. We shall be pressing for real progress in the new convention on those issues, like the freezing, seizing and confiscation of the assets of drug traffickers and the extradition of such offenders, where international co-operation is absolutely crucial if the drugs menace is to be defeated. The United Kingdom is submitting this week its response to the United Nations on matters to be included in the convention, and I shall arrange for copies of the response to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the number of persons (a) against whom extradition proceedings have been taken or are planned in relation to drugs-related offences and (b) who are sought by police forces to assist them with inquiries into drug related matters, who have sought asylum in foreign countries between 1980 and 1985.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Drugs (Seizures)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what amounts of class A drugs were seized by the police between 1980 and 1985 in each region.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the total amounts of class A drugs seized by the police in the United Kingdom for 1980 to 1983 was given in table 1.3 of "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs, United Kingdom, Supplementary Tables 1983"; corresponding information for 1984 and 1985 is not yet available. Provision of a breakdown by region would involve disproportionate cost.

Children (Offences)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many children were charged with offences relating to sections 32, 33 and 34 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, for (a) Billericay petty sessional area (b) Essex and (c) England and Wales, for each of the past five years;

(2) how many children were charged with offences relating to sections 35 and 36 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861 for (a) Billericay petty sessional area (b) Essex and (c) England and Wales, for each of the past five years;

(3) how many children were convicted of offences relating to sections 32, 33 and 34 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861; and what was the average sentence for (a) Billericay petty sessional area (b) Essex and (c) England and Wales, for each of the past five years;

(4) how many children were convicted of offences relating to sections 35 and 36 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861; and what was the average sentence for (a) Billericay petty sessional area (b) Essex and (c) England and Wales, for each of the past five years;

(5) in what percentage of cases of children convicted under sections 35 and 36 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861 compensation orders were made against parents for (a) Billericay petty sessional area (b) Essex and (c) England and Wales, for each of the past five years;

(6) in what percentage of cases of children convicted under sections 32, 33 and 34 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 compensation orders were made against parents for (a) Billericay petty sessional area (b) Essex and (c) England and Wales, for each of the past five years;

(7) how many children were cautioned under sections 35 and 36 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861 by (a) Essex police and (b) the British Transport police for each of the past five years; and what percentage of these resided in south-east Essex;

(8) how many children were cautioned under sections 32, 33 and 34 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 by (a) Essex police and (b) British Transport police for each of the past five years; and what percentage of these resided in south-east Essex;

(9) how many children have been convicted of offences relating to section 56 of the British Transport Commission Act 1949, what was the average sentence for (a) the Billericay petty sessional area, (b) Essex, and (c) for England and Wales for each of the past five years;

(10) how many children were charged with offences relating to section 56 of the British Tranport Commission Act 1949 for (a) the Billericay petty sessional area, (b) Essex, and (c) for England and Wales for each of the past five years;

(11) on how many occasions compensation orders have been made on parents of children convicted of offences relating to section 56 of the British Transport Commission Act 1949 in (a) the Billericay petty sessional area, (b) Essex, and (c) in England and Wales for each of the past five years.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his replies, 18 June 1985, c. 88-89 and 20 June 1985, c. 185]: The information available to me, which may be incomplete is given in the following table for 1980-83; corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Question (3) has been taken to refer to the Offences Against the Persons Act 1861.

Information collected centrally does not include details of cautions by the British Transport police, nor on the place of residence of offenders. For offences under sections 32 to 34 of the Offences Against the Persons Act 1861, the information for England and Wales is published annually in "Criminal Statistics England and Wales, Supplementary Tables", under offence classification 6: in vol 1, tables S1.1(B) and S1.1(C)—magistrates' courts, in vol 2, tables S2.1(B) and S2.1(C)—the Crown Court and in vol 4, table S4.1(C)—cautions.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teaching—Non-teaching Staff Ratios

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the ratio of teaching to non-teaching staff under the control of the director of education in each local education authority.

Mr. Dunn: The information is not readily available.

Area Advisory Committees

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to how many local education authorities have or have had area advisory committees, and as to their composition, powers, and functions.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities may set up area advisory committees at their discretion and they do not require the approval of my right hon. Friend. The Department does not therefore hold any information on them.

Local Education Committees

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the number of local education authorities in which schemes have been approved under circular 8/73; what information he has as to which authorities have amended their schemes subsequently; on what dates; and of what these amendments consisted.

Mr. Dunn: All local education authorities in England have arrangements for their education committee which have been approved by my right hon. Friend or his predecessors, as they have been required by law to do since 1944.

It is not possible to provide the further detail requested except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many proposed schemes regarding the composition of local education committees under circular 8/73 he has rejected or amended; on what date; and for what reasons.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has no power to amend proposals as to the composition of education committees. Since September 1981 he has approved all such proposals which have been put formally to him, with the exception of three which have been recently received and on which no decision has yet been reached.

Polytechnics

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the education equipment bids to his Department from all the English polytechnics via their respective education authorities in 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not available. Local education authorities' bids for equipment do not distinguish between polytechnics and their other further education institutions.

It is for the authority to determine the apportionment of its allocation of prescribed capital expenditure, made under section 72 of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980, between institutions maintained by them. It has been the Department's practice in recent years to meet in full LEAs' bids for farther and higher education equipment required for teaching and research.

Some information on allocations to authorities for equipment for advanced further education as a whole is available, however, and I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) on 24 January at column 476.

Collective Worship

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he has taken to ensure that there are satisfactory arrangements for collective worship at the Winston Churchill school, Woking.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has raised this matter with Surrey county council, and I understand that the school's governing body has recently discussed the arrangements made for collective worship. I will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received calling for changes in the law regarding religious instruction in schools and the requirement for a daily assembly and act of worship; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: We have received a small number of letters from members of the public; and earlier this year I met representatives of the National Association of Head Teachers to discuss their views on this matter. As my right hon. Friend has made clear in response to the Swann report and on other occasions, the Government have no plans to propose changes in the existing statutory provisions on religious instruction and collective worship in schools, and we look to local education authorities and individual schools to ensure that the statutory requirements are met.

Science

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what opportunities are provided to improve the understanding of senior officials in his Department advising him on priorities in the allocation of the science budget of the practical working of the private sector of industry.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is advised by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils on priorities in the allocation of the science budget. Members of the ABRC include a number of senior industrialists who are able to give first hand advice on the practical working of the private sector of industry.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Law Society (Coopers and Lybrand Report)

41. Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the Lord Chancellor's consideration of the Coopers and Lybrand report on the Law Society's role and functions.

The Attorney-General: I understand that The Law Society intends to publish the report soon as the basis of its consultation on the handling of complaints against solicitors. The Lord Chancellor will await the outcome of that consultation.

Judges (Retirement)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Attorney-General how many judges have continued to serve beyond retirement age in order to sit in Diplock trial cases in the last 10 years; and what was the age at which each eventually retired.

The Attorney-General: None.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Attorney-General what is the age and name of the oldest judge currently sitting in Diplock courts; and what was the age and name of the oldest judge ever to hear such cases since these courts were established.

The Attorney-General: The answer to both parts of the hon. Member's question is Lord Justice Gibson. He is now aged 72, having been born on 1 May 1913.

Johnson Matthey

Mr. Skinner asked the Attorney-General whether he will make a statement on the inquiry by the fraud investigation group into the affairs of Johnson Matthey Bankers.

The Attorney-General: There is no inquiry of this nature in progress.

SCOTLAND

Multi-occupation

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration his Department has given to the problems of multi-occupancy; and what discussions his Department has had with Glasgow district council over legislative measures to control the sub-division of flats.

Mr. Ancram: Matters concerning houses in multiple occupation receive on-going consideration by the Scottish Development Department. My officials are currently considering proposals for a registration scheme for houses in multiple occupation, submitted informally by Glasgow district council. In its final form, the registration scheme will require the approval of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State under section 100 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1966.

Pratt and Whitney (European Service Centre)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will place copies of all correspondence between his Department and Pratt and Whitney regarding the establishment of a European service centre at Prestwick in the Library;

(2) on what occasions and in what manner he or any Minister or official in his Department has communicated with Pratt and Whitney regarding the establishment of their European service centre at Prestwick;

(3) what communications he had with Pratt and Whitney before answering the parliamentary question of the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley on 18 June, Official Report, column 124.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No. Details of communications between Ministers or departmental officials and commercial companies cannot be disclosed, as to do so would break commercial confidentiality.

ENVIRONMENT

Farm Buildings

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide that farmers require planning permission for the erection of all farm buildings.

Mr. Macfarlane: The erection of new agricultural buildings already requires planning permission, although general permission for many such buildings is given by class VI of the general development order. My Department has published proposals to amend the GDO so as to require specific planning permission for the development of livestock buildings near residential property; and proposals to qualify the exercise of GDO rights in respect of farm and forestry buildings and roads in the national parks.

Berne Convention (Biennial Report)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to send the biennial report required under article 9 of the Berne convention to the convention's secretariat; and if, at that time, copies of the report will be made available to voluntary conservation organisations.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Kingdom report under article 9 of the Berne convention should be sent to the convention's secretariat by the end of July. In accordance with the terms of the convention, the report will be made to the standing committee and it is for that committee to decide upon any wider distribution.

Derelict Land

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards the future development of disused industrial land which is not currently eligible for derelict land grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government are concerned that disused industrial land should be brought back into productive use as soon as possible. In many areas where land is not eligible for derelict land grant there are other grants, particularly urban development grant and the urban programme.

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will conduct a review of the various forms of grant available for environmental improvement work in areas of industrial and other man-made dereliction in order to establish the extent to which the current system offers scope for simplifications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: We have recently reviewed derelict land reclamation policy, including the proposed after-use of reclaimed sites. We propose to issue for consultation shortly a draft circular to local authorities which will set out priorities for the programme and outline the changes to the system which we propose to introduce for the next financial year.

Information Technology Centre 6502 (Funding)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will explain his reasons for his decision to withdraw urban aid programme funding for the Information Technology Centre 6502 in Moss Side, Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Urban programme funding for the Moss Side information technology centre has not been withdrawn. Urban programme grant was given on the capital costs (£83,000) of the centre on its establishment in 1982 and aid at £32,000 per annum towards its running costs in the first three years. That support has been extended at a level of £16,000 per annum for a further three years.

Specialist Land Reclamation Teams

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards the future status and functions of the specialist land reclamation teams currently employed by metropolitan county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Decisions on the future of the specialist reclamation teams employed by the metropolitan county councils must properly be taken by the successor authorities. At the same time my Department is prepared to use its good offices in advising how the teams might be maintained if there is a demand for this from the successor authorities.

The Local Government Bill has now been amended to require residuary bodies to ask each successor authority before abolition about the desirability of their taking over certain staff on the abolition date, in order to provide services temporarily to the successor bodies while long-term arrangements are being finalised.

Chinese Archway, Manchester

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he is prepared to make to the Manchester city council request for a special contribution towards the construction of a Chinese archway in the city centre area known as Chinatown.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Manchester city council has proposed joint funding under the urban programme but Greater Manchester council has yet to decide on the source of its share of the funding. Additionally, Manchester city council has not submitted its inner area programme for 1985-86. A response on this individual proposal is therefore not appropriate at this time.

Small Businesses

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to encourage local authorities to allow non-polluting, new small businesses to be set up and to grow with the minimum of bureaucratic controls.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I take it that my hon. friend has planning controls chiefly in mind. Our aim since coming into office has been to reduce unnecessary planning controls generally and to make the system as simple and efficient as possible. A wide range of further measures of relevance to small businesses is being considered following consultation on such matters as the proposal for simplified planning zones and amendments to the general development order. The circular and booklet on guidance for small firms which my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State announced to the House on 22 April at column 720 will be published in draft shortly.

Liverpool

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, following the decision by Liverpool city council to set a rate for 1985-86, he intends to make payments to it for rate-related grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson) on Friday 28 June 1985 at columns 515-16.

Job Creation

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much Government money has been committed to projects that have created jobs in the Greater London area since 1979.

Sir George Young: This answer can be only provided at a disproportionate cost.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa (Famine)

48. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the famine in Africa and how it is being alleviated by British, European and international agencies supported by the United Kingdom.

Mr. Raison: The famine in Africa continues to be very serious, especially in Ethiopia and the Sudan. Substantial progress in the provision of food has been made, but port-discharge, transport and distribution problems persist in several countries. The United Nations office for emergency operations in Africa is making a concerted effort to overcome those problems. We continue to make a significant contribution from the £60 million of emergency assistance I announced in Geneva in March.

Africa (Food Supplies)

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what study his Department has made of the possible use of the developing generation of British airships for the delivery of emergency food supplies to the destitute areas of Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: We are following progress in this field, but at present relative payloads, cost and operating difficulties would appear to make airships less attractive than aircraft for emergency relief operations.

THE ARTS

Kessler Collection

Mr. Latham asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether the Minister for the Arts will take immediate action to rectify the insurance indemnity problem which has arisen, under section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980, preventing the Kessler art collection being loaned by the Tate Gallery for exhibition in Leicestershire as from 27 July.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is no reason why, under present loan arrangements through the Government indemnity scheme, the Tate Gallery should not lend pictures for exhibition.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Labour Statistics

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the proportion of people directly and indirectly involved in agriculture in Britain and other EEC countries.

Mrs. Fenner: Information in respect of people indirectly engaged in agriculture is not available. The latest available information on the proportion of people directly engaged in agriculture is as follows:

	Per cent.
United Kingdom	*2·6
Germany	†5·4
France	†7·9
Italy	†12·0
Netherlands	†4·9
Belgium	†2·9
Luxembourg	†4·7

Denmark	†8·5
Greece	‡30·0

Atlantic Salmon

Mr. Onslow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further information he has now obtained about the action of the Canadian authorities in banning commercial fishing for Atlantic salmon in Canadian waters.

Mr. MacGregor: Since my reply of 7 June at column 293, I have learned that, for the 1985 season, the actions the Canadian authorities have taken include a local ban on commercial fishing in the Maritime Provinces only. This ban does not extend to the commercial fishing of Newfoundland, Labrador or Quebec.

I understand that no decision has been taken as to what happens next year, and that consultations will be held with the Canadian industry to develop a longer-term plan for the entire Canadian Atlantic fishery.

Wheat Seed

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from producers of wheat seed in Britain about the effects on the industry of the growth of equivalent subsidised imports; what import quotas are currently in force; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I have received no such representations. There are no quotas for imports of wheat seed into the United Kingdom. The level of imports from third countries is negligible compared with total production of wheat seed in this country.

Pigs

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will have discussions with the pig industry to seek to produce a social cost-benefit analysis for the pig industry to assist future planning of the industry.

Mr. MacGregor: I doubt whether it would be possible to produce a meaningful social cost-benefit analysis for the pig industry. But we are in constant touch with associations representing pig farmers and processors about future developments in the pig industry in general and about such matters as production, structure, income and costs, animal health and welfare, the environment, pollution, processing, hygiene and trade in particular.

Farm Animal Disease

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will bring forward proposals for a co-operative approach between Government and the industry to the funding of farm animal disease control; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government are always willing to discuss with the industry measures for dealing with diseases of farm livestock. A co-operative approach already exists under which there are many and regular meetings with the industry to discuss and determine ways and means of dealing with the various disease problems which arise.

Aujeszky's Disease

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it remains his policy to seek to control for the time being and eventually eradicate Aujeszky's disease.

Mrs. Fenner: The policy for dealing with Aujeszky's disease remains the same. The objective of the programme was initially to control and then to seek to eradicate the disease. Control was quickly achieved and considerable progress has been made towards the ultimate goal of eradication.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration he has given to employing procedures other than the entire slaughter of all herds containing one or more Aujeszky's sero-positive pigs; and what consultation he has had with the pig industry on the subject.

Mrs. Fenner: Careful consideration has been given to the principle of selective slaughter instead of whole herd slaughter where circumstances reveal only one or a few infected animals. Consultations were held and agreement reached with the Pig Disease Eradication Fund Ltd. to the adoption of this approach if the state veterinary service considered it appropriate in particular circumstances.

Wheat

Mr. Hoyle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantity of category 3 wheat from the EEC is stored in the United Kingdom; what intervention price per tonne is paid for this wheat; where it is stored; and what it is used for.

Mr. MacGregor: Offerers are not required to state the category (or class) of wheat delivered into intervention, but it is probable that almost all of the 3·3 million tonnes of common wheat stored in the United Kingdom falls into class III: varieties not usually accepted for inclusion in breadmaking grists by United Kingdom millers. The common wheat intervention price rose from £113·05 per tonne to £127·36 per tonne over the first ten months of the current marketing year, and offerers receive the price for the month scheduled for delivery of their wheat into store. The wheat is held in 145 intervention stores in England and Scotland, and its main use would be for animal feed.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the proportions of youth training scheme leavers going to the following destinations for each available month of the 15 per cent. leavers sample and for each of the previous samples (a) full-time work with the same employer, (b) full-time work with a different employer, (c) part-time work, (d) full-time college or training course, (e) back at school, (f) on another youth training scheme, (g) claimant unemployed and (h) other; and if he will show for each survey (i) the proportion of respondents who had left the scheme early and (ii) the usable percentage response rate.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission introduced a regular monthly survey of leavers from the youth training scheme in 1984. Questionnaires are sent to a 15 per cent. sample of all leavers in each month some three months after they leave the scheme. Leavers in June 1984 were the first group to be covered by this survey. An earlier programme of ad hoc surveys provided comparable information about young people who left the scheme before June 1984. The results of all completed surveys are given in the table.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed people in Slough and in Berkshire had registered details of their skills and experience at jobcentres at the most recent date for which the information is available; and what proportion those numbers represented of the total registered as unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 3 May 1985, 418 job seekers were registered in Slough and 2,329 job seekers registered in Berkshire. These figures include a small number of employed people seeking a change of employment. Unemployed people are no longer required to register at the jobcentre as a condition of claiming benefit. However, it is not necessary to register for employment in order to use the jobcentre. It should not be assumed that these figures represent all the job seekers in the area who are actively looking for work. Large numbers of job seekers regularly use the self-service display areas from where 65 per cent. of the vacancies notified to jobcentres are filled.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the number of job vacancies filled each month.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is estimated that, during 1984-85, on average about 600,000 job vacancies were filled each month.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information is collected by his Department on the state of the labour market in travel-to-work areas, other than the number of people registered as unemployed and job vacancies notified directly to jobcentres.

Mr. Alan Clark: The labour market data collected by the Department for travel-to-work areas are as follows:

(i) Monthly counts of the claimant unemployed resident in each area analysed by sex, with quarterly analyses by age and duration of unemployment;

(ii) Triennial estimates of employees in employment in each area, analysed by sex and industry and full-time/part-time status.

Statistics of job vacancies and of confirmed redundancies are collected for jobcentre areas, from which approximations can be made for travel-to-work areas.

Information on certain aspects of labour markets in travel-to-work areas, such as the occupations of those in employment, is also available to the Department from the decennial census of population, which is conducted by the office of population censuses and surveys.

Job Creation

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any figures for jobs created as a result of grants from the European Economic Community.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The European Commission has estimated that, from the inception of the European regional development fund in 1975 to the end of 1983, grants were awarded to industrial projects in the United Kingdom which directly created 109,790 new jobs and preserved 52,590 existing jobs. In addition, about 70 per cent. of the allocations to the United Kingdom in that period were made to capital investments in infrastructure, and this resulted indirectly in the creation of many more jobs. Information on the European Social Fund is not available in the same form but, of the figure of about 1,200,000 people taking part in training and employment schemes supported by the fund in the United Kingdom in 1984, about 300,000 were on job creation schemes.

Wages Councils

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to be in a position to make a statement on the future of wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No decision on the future of wages councils will be made before we have completed our study of the many and varied responses to our consultative paper.

Prices

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the increase in the retail prices index (a) over the period 1979-80 to 1984-85 and (b) over the period 1980-81 to 1984-85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The retail prices index increased by 52·7 per cent. between financial years 1979-80 and 1984-85 and by 31·3 per cent. between financial years 1980-81 and 1984-85. Retail prices rose by 21·8 per cent. during the first financial year mentioned and by 6·9 per cent. in the last, indicating the success of present Government policy.

Air Pollution

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of enforcements by Her Majesty's air pollution inspectorate of air pollution legislation in the years since 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of enforcements by Her Majesty's industrial air pollution inspectorate of air pollution legislation for the years since 1979 are as follows:

Year	Prosecutions	Improvement notices
1979	7	—
1980	10	*17
1981	17	4
1982	20	4
Total	72	28

* Fourteen of these were for one registered works.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how long applicants for the enterprise allowance scheme in Portsmouth and Hampshire currently have to wait on average before being granted an appointment at the initial information seminar.

Mr. Alan Clark: Potential applicants for the enterprise allowance scheme in the Hampshire and Isle of Wight area wait on average one to two weeks to attend an information session. No separate information is available for the Portsmouth area.

Asbestos

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many licences under the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 have been issued.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number issued is 1,833.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment to what he attributes the large disparity in the number of enforcements of asbestos licensing regulations issued in the different Health and Safety Executive areas.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number and nature of asbestos contracts for which a licence is required varies between Health and Safety Executive areas, and a similar level of enforcement activity in each area is not expected. Some contracts are of short duration and modest risk. Other more complex work, possibly associated with demolition, may call for increased attention. As a result of the asbestos (licensing) regulations and requirements to notify work with asbestos which have been a condition of most licences, enforcing authorities are now able to take into account knowledge of contractors' ability to strip asbestos competently, thus enabling inspectors to decide how much time they need to devote to particular sites.

Football Ground Safety

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will extend the scope of community programme work to assist with necessary safety work at football league grounds.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The relevance of community programme support for work on football league grounds will be considered, taking account of discussions which my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport is having with the football organisations and Government Departments about the financing of ground improvements.

Technology (Training)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what steps he is taking to improve the availability of high technology and information technology training for mature staff in both public and private sectors;

(2) what steps he is taking to encourage employers to retrain existing staff in information technology and high technology skills.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Primary responsibility for retraining existing employees will continue to remain with employers in both the public and the private sector. However, the Government's pump priming support for adult training gives priority to new technology skills and to new open learning techniques. These include the open tech programme, priority skills training and local training grants to employers. We are also improving access by employed people to new technology training through skillcentre new technology access centres, information technology centres and the access to information technology scheme.

Community Programme

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the number of people who so far have been on the community programme who were under the age of 25 years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information on the number of entrants to the community programme and the percentage of those entrants under the age of 25 is set out in the table:

	Total entrants	Percentage under 25
October 1982-May 1983	28,539	54
June 1983-May 1984	142,906	55
June 1984-May 1985	166,168	63

ENERGY

Energy Conservation

Mr. Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to encourage greater energy conservation and the use of energy conservation devices in the public sector, particularly in regard to heat loss in tower blocks and from both military and civil government establishments, and to promote low-cost, alternative energy generators at remote locations.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government's energy efficiency campaign which aims to promote energy efficiency over all sectors of the economy has generated an upsurge in interest and activity. In particular, I am encouraging the appointment of energy managers in both public and private sectors whose task it is to act as a focus for the improvement of energy efficiency in their own establishments.

Oil Exploration (Warwickshire)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to extend the area of Warwickshire licensed for (a) oil exploration and (b) oil production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Petroleum (Production) (Landward Areas) Regulations 1984 set out the arrangements for applications for new licences. On 25 June 1985, at column 360, I announced that the Secretary of State for Energy will on 2 July formally invite applications for exploration licences for unlicensed areas. Unlicensed areas of Warwickshire could therefore be applied for in this round. I have sent my hon. Friend a map indicating existing licensed areas in Warwickshire.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what inquiries he has had since he last granted oil exploration licences for Warwickshire about (a) further exploration and (b) production; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what parts of Warwickshire have to date been prospected for (a) oil and (b) other hydrocarbons with negative results; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Exploration for oil and other hydrocarbons has taken place in southern parts of Warwickshire. Specifically a network of seismic lines was shot in July 1984 in exploration licences XLs 176 and 197 along and south of a line between Dorsington and Banbury. The survey included areas outside Warwickshire, but in that county the survey was of the area around Shipston-on-Stour.

A further survey in XL 176 is planned for July 1985, parts of which will be in Warwickshire around Dorsington, Shipston-on-Stour and Great Wolford.

In May 1984, one short line in production licence PL 168 was shot near Banton on the Heath.

I refer my hon. Friend to my answer given today in relation to the evaluation of seismic data. No other interest in areas in Warwickshire has been expressed to my Department.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what progress has been made under the production licences to secure oil production in Warwickshire; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if, further to the reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 27 June, Official Report, columns 473-74, concerning oil exploration in Warwickshire, he will make a statement on the outcome to date of the seismic surveys conducted.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Seismic surveys have been carried out in the licensed areas of Warwickshire. Such surveys should provide evidence as to whether or not suitable structures, which could contain oil, exist. The detailed analysis of the data they provide is a lengthy procedure and has not yet been completed by the licensees. Results of all seismic surveys are, however, confidential to the licensees concerned and are not made available publicly.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what licences are currently in force for (a) exploration and (b) production of hydrocarbons other than oil in Warwickshire; if he will specify in each case the date of issue, to whom the licence has been issued, the period of the licence, the precise area covered and progress to date; and if he will make a statement;

(2) further to the reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 27 June, Official Report, columns 473-74, concerning oil exploration in Warwickshire, if he will specify the precise areas within which (a) each of the production licences and (b) each of the exploration licences are operative.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Parts of two production licences (PLs) are in areas of Warwickshire. The licence boundaries are given in the following grid references.

PL 168	SP 10002900,	SP 15002900,	SP 15002600,
	SP 22502600,	SP 22503400,	SP 30003400,

	SP 30004000.

Parts of two exploration licences (XLs) are in areas of Warwickshire. The licence boundaries are as follows:

XL	SP 11005000,	SP 40005000,	SP 40004000,
	SP 30004000,	SP 30003400,	SP 22503400,

A production licence grants the right to search, bore for and get petroleum, which is defined as any mineral oil or relative hydrocarbon and natural gas existing in its natural condition in strata, but excluding coal, bituminous shale or other stratified deposits from which oil can be extracted by destructive distillation. An exploration licence of this type grants the right to search but not bore for petroleum. The exercise of the right granted by these licences is subject to all necessary permissions, including planning permission where necessary. I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 27 June for the details of licensees, date of grant and period of licence.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information is available to him as to any correlation between the incidence of coal deposits in south Warwickshire and of hydrocarbons, including oil, in that approximate area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The National Coal Board has sent out to local authorities its proposals for the development of the 400-million tonne reserve of coal in south Warwickshire. There is no information available to confirm the presence of hydrocarbons in this area.

DEFENCE

Multilaunch Rocket System

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest position on production of the multilaunch rocket system project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer given to the hon. Member on 22 May 1985 at columns 424-5.

Dry Training

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it would be possible to carry out at Spadeadam all the dry training he now propses should take place on land at Stainmore; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: No.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now undertake urgent studies into the potential use of land on the north-west and south-east of the present firing points on Worcop ranges for the purposes of dry training.

Mr. Lee: No. This land is privately owned and we have no indication that it is to become available for purchase or lease.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now withdraw his proposal to acquire land for dry training at Stainmore in light of the decision by Eden district council to object to the proposal.

Mr. Lee: We have just received the council's response to the PSA's notice of proposed development. We are now considering the way forward.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence what would be the future of Worcop and the live firing ranges if he fails to acquire additional land for dry training at Stainmore.

Mr. Lee: Use of Warcop training area would continue as at present. However, we would still face difficulties in providing suitable facilities for low level training for small units in military skills for which there is no need for live ammunition to be fired, and we would therefore continue to have a requirement to acquire a dry training area close by.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the figures showing the maximum potential utilisation of Warcop at present and its actual usage over the last two years.

Mr. Lee: There is a very heavy, continuing demand for the training facilities at Warcop training area, which are almost invariably used to capacity. It is not possible to produce realistic figures to show what the maximum potential usage of the training area would be as these will vary depending on the assumptions used in the calculation about the nature and pattern of the training being conducted. The usage in 1983-84 amounted to 112,324 man training days and in 1984-85 to 177,736 man training days.

Houses

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of houses in his Department's ownership in Portsmouth, Gosport, Fareham and Havant districts; and how many of these are currently occupied.

Mr. Lee: The numbers are as follows:

	Stock	Occupied
Royal Navy
Portsmouth	1,586	4285
Gosport	3,622
Fareham	87
Havant	—
Army
Gosport Portsmouth	111	109
Thorney Island	211	198

The unoccupied Royal Navy houses are vacant for the following reasons:

	Number
Vacant allocated	42
Vacant furnishing	45
Awaiting works services	196
Undergoing works services	252
Vacant	502

Plans are in hand to reduce our stocks of houses significantly over the next few years.

Arms Sales

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the percentage value of total arms exports sold and delivered to each African country for 1980 to 1984.

Mr. Butler: It has been the consistent policy of successive Governments not to publish detailed figures of defence sales to individual overseas customers beyond those given in volume II of the statement on the Defence Estimates.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current level of sales by the Defence Sales Organisation regarding British arms sales to the Third world and indicate the expected rate of increase in arms deliveries for 1985 as compared with 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Butler: The Defence Sales Organisation is fundamentally concerned with supporting sales by British industry, whose export figures are given as follows. There is no generally accepted definition of the term "Third-world" countries. However, taking the 45 poorest countries in the world according to the 1985 World Bank atlas—excluding states with a population of less than 100,000 and all dependencies—the value of United Kingdom defence contracts known to us for 1983 was £842·4 million. The comparative figure for 1984 was £443·36 million; no meaningful statistics are yet available for the first half of 1985.

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement outlining his policy with regard to safeguards and standards governing the supply and sale of arms to countries in the Third world.

Mr. Butler: Arms sales to any country require an export licence, and before this authority is granted a wide variety of considerations is taken into account. These considerations will vary depending on individual circumstances, but they will always include the stability of the region, the nature of the equipment to be sold, the Government of the purchasing country and their policies, the need to safeguard British dependent territories and our national security interests. These criteria are kept under review in the light of changing circumstances.

Brecon Barracks (Cleaning)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the name of the firm which has the contract for cleaning Brecon barracks.

Mr. Lee: The name of the firm which has the contract for cleaning Brecon barracks is Office Cleaning Services (Wales) Ltd.

Faslane

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of Defence what steps he takes to satisfy himself of the safety of the convoy travelling regularly beween Burghfield and Faslane; and if he will list all recent incidents, including mechanical failure of the transporters, which have taken place, together with their locations.

Mr. Stanley: All aspects of safety remain under review. The information on incidents which the right hon. Member has requested might enable the routes of military convoys to be deduced and it is not our general practice to disclose the routes of military convoys.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Private Sector Industry

49. Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what opportunities are provided to improve the understanding of senior officials in his Department of the practical workings of the private sector of industry.

Mr. Hayhoe: Secondments to private sector firms for two or three years are a matter of Treasury policy. Five officials at principal level or above are at present on such secondments. In addition, a few officials are having or have had non-executive appointments to company boards.

Privatisation Programme

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the parts of the publicly-owned sector which have been privatised since 1979, distinguishing between nationalised industries and other organisations.

Mr. Moore: The 1985 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428, table 2.14) gives details of special sales of assets from 1979-80 to 1983-94. The main sales in 1984-85 were Enterprise Oil, British Telecom, the Government's remaining shares in Associated British Ports Holdings, various National Enterprise Board shareholdings, and ninth round North sea oil licence premia. Full details for 1984-85 will be published in the next public expenditure White Paper. Additionally, in 1984-85, BLMC Limited sold Jaguar PLC and retained the receipts.

Among the main concerns transferred to the private sector since 1979, the following were, or were part of, nationalised industries:

British Aerospace
National Freight Company
Britoil
Associated British Ports Holdings
International Aeradio
British Rail Hotels
Wytch Farm Enterprise Oil
Sealink
British Telecommunications
Scott Lithgow

British Rail, British Shipbuilders, British Steel Corporation, National Coal Board and Scottish Transport Group have also disposed of a number of other smaller subsidiaries and peripheral activities during the period.

Nationalised Industries

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what external financing limits were set for nationalised industries in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85; and how these limits compare with the outturn in each case.

Mr. Peter Rees: Available information is set out in the following table.

Provisional outturn figures for 1984-85 will be published shortly in the 1984-85 cash limits White Paper.

BTDB was privatised in February 1983. Outturn shown to that point.

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what organisations are recognised as nationalised industries for the purposes of the application of external financing limits in 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Rees: Nationalised industries and their external financing limits (EFLs) for 1985-86 are set out in table 5.5 of the 1985 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428), except British Airways, for which no EFL was announced in view of impending privatisation.

EC (Capital Market)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to ensure that progress in the European Community towards the completion of the internal market should include the development of a fully integrated market for capital.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government welcome the proposals in the Commission's White Paper on the internal market for removing barriers to the freedom to provide financial services throughout the Community. In the Government's view, the single most important step which could be taken to bring about an integrated market in financial services would be the abolition of exchange controls. The United Kingdom takes all appropriate opportunities to emphasise in the Council of Ministers the importance of free capital markets.

Income Tax

Mr. Portillo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of total receipts from income tax is paid by taxpayers on average and below average incomes.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Portillo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer in how many countries of which he has knowledge the starting rate of national income tax is higher than 30 per cent.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 27 June 1985, c. 493]: One, Ireland, with a starting rate of 35 per cent.

Departmental Offices

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration he has given to the use of labour-saving benefits from the use of new technology to enable offices of bodies for which his Department is responsible which directly serve the public to remain open in the evening and at weekends.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Treasury as such is not responsible for any bodies the offices of which provide a direct service to the public.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many jobs have been created by the business expansion scheme; and what is the average cost of each job created;

(2) what is the average failure rate among firms which have received support from the business expansion scheme; and how these figures compare with the average failure rate of small businesses in general.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 16 May, Official Report, columns 191-92, concerning EC own resources, to what factors he attributes the fact that the United Kingdom's value added tax contribution, as a percentage of gross domestic product, has risen by more than that of any other member state except Luxembourg since 1980.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 27 June 1985, c. 492]: Value added tax contributions to the EC are affected by a variety of factors, including the pattern of consumer expenditure and the prevailing economic climate in each country. Moreover, member states' annual VAT contributions shown in the table include adjustments relating to previous years. These factors distort comparisons between changes in United Kingdom VAT contributions as a percentage of GDP and those of other member states.

Such comparisons need, in any case, to take account of the United Kingdom's refunds and abatements. The Fontainebleau agreement now ensures that the United Kingdom's VAT contributions will be substantially reduced.

VAT

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect on small businesses of the current value added tax exemption limit.

Mr. Hayhoe: The effect of the VAT exemption limit on small businesses is kept under regular review. A proper balance is required between the need to contain the administrative costs of the tax for both traders and Customs and Excise on the one hand and, on the other, the need to maintain the yield of tax and minimise distortion of competition between those who are registered for VAT and those who are not. Increases in the limit are restricted by the EC sixth VAT directive to those amounts which maintain its value in real terms. The Government consider that the level set in the directive is too low; the matter has been raised in the European Council and the Government will continue to press this point.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Bank Accounts

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the most recent information available to his Department from the banks concerning the percentage of the adult population who are still without bank accounts; and what estimate he has made of the proportion who are social security beneficiaries.

Mr. Whitney: The latest information available to the Department indicates that 27 per cent. of adults have no account of any kind with a bank. It is not possible to estimate what proportion are social security beneficiaries.

Credit Transfer

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has made of the financial advantage to his Department of using automated credit transfer and retaining pension money for longer than if it is supplied to the Post Office to fund payment by order book.

Mr. Whitney: On average, payment of pensions by automated credit transfer rather than by weekly order book produces a financial advantage to the Department from retaining the money longer of rather less than ½ per cent. of the amount paid out.

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the annual cost of paying pensions by automated credit transfer against the annual cost of payment by order books.

Mr. Whitney: We estimate that in 1984-85 it cost £9·00 to pay a retirement pension by four-weekly automated credit transfer and £18·20 by weekly payment by order book.

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now assess the additional offsetting savings that would accrue from beneficiaries accepting automated credit transfer on the basis of payment two weeks in advance and two weeks in arrears instead of four weeks in arrears.

Mr. Whitney: There would be offsetting savings only if the change led to an increase in the number of beneficiaries accepting payment by automated credit transfer rather than by order book. The extent to which this would happen can only be conjectural and no reliable figures for the saving can be given.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many households in December 1983 and December 1984 were having weekly deductions made from their supplementary benefit for electricity and how many for gas, under £2 per week and in each £1 band above £2 per week.

Mr. Whitney: The table sets out the information requested as recorded in the annual statistical inquiry for December 1983. The information is not yet available for December 1984.

Notes:
1. Some claimants have direct payment arrangements in respect of more than one type of fuel so the number of households affected will be less than the total number of arrangements.
2. Totals do not sum due to rounding.

Nurses (Back Pain)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to complete his consideration of the research report into back pain amongst nurses and of the report of the independent assessors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I cannot at present give a firm date. As I explained in my reply to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 27 March, we need to give careful consideration to this report before we can decide whether and, if so, what further useful guidance should be given to health authorities.

Mr. Philip Leitch (Suicide)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish his findings about Mr. Philip Leitch's alleged suicide; when he expects to complete his inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Following reports about Mr. Leitch's attempted suicide, we have received a report from the DHSS office in Telford about his claim for supplementary benefit. While it would not be appropriate for the Department to make public the details of an individual's claim for benefit, I can say that the independent adjudicating authorities have now determined that Mr. Leitch is exempt from the time limits on payment as a boarder.

Patient Statistics

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of people in England registered with a general practitioner at the latest convenient date; and what percentage of the total population this represents.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The total number of patients in England registered with a general medical practitioner at 1 October 1983 was 49,262,580. This represented 105·66 per cent. of the total civilian population in England. The difference is accounted for by delays in removing from doctors' lists patients who have died, emigrated, or transfered to other doctors. This inflation of lists is extremely unsatisfactory but it does not cause additional cost to taxpayers because the remuneration and total fee structure for general practitioners is based on a target average remuneration for all practitioners.

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the total gross expenditure, current and capital, on the National Health Service in England for each year since 1971-72 for (a) hospital and community health services, (b) family practitioner committees and their predecessors and (c) centrally funded services with the percentage increase in real terms (gross domestic product deflator), percentage increase deflated by the retail prices index and percentage increase deflated by movements in National Health Service pay and prices.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The tables set out total gross expenditure (current and capital) in the National Health Service in England for each year since 1971-72. Percentage changes in real terms are measured by the gross domestic product deflator. As the hon. Member has specifically asked for the figures to be deflated by the retail price index, and by National Health Service pay and prices, they are also given, but I do not accept that these figures are sensible measures of expenditure in real terms.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the level of National Health Service expenditure each year since 1960; what percentage change each year this represents in real terms as measured by the retail prices index; what percentage change each year this represents in terms of National Health Service pay and prices; and what percentage change each year this represents in terms of gross domestic product.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 7 June at columns 291-2.

NHS (Budget)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out, for each year since 1960, (a) Exchequer supplement, (b) national insurance contributions, (c) National Health Service charges levied and (d) other revenue sources contributing each year to the total National Health Service budget; and what percentage of total revenue each year came from each of these sources.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 14 May at columns 118-20.

Family Credit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision he intends to make for the self-employed when family income supplement is abolished and replaced by family credit under his Green Paper proposals.

Mr. Newton: Our intention is that self-employed people, as well as employed people, will be able to claim the proposed family credit on behalf of their families.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, for each of the years 1973 to 1984, he will provide such information as is available to his Department centrally as to the numbers of hospital beds in National Health Service hospitals in England in acute specialties, and in geriatrics, mental illness, mental handicap, and maternity (general practitioner and consultant obstetrics), and the total for all specialties, which were (a) closed as a result of the closure of complete hospitals, (b) closed in hospitals which were not completely closed, (c) provided as a result of opening new hospitals, and (d) provided in additions or modifications to existing hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are quite unable to answer a question which requests a huge quantity of information broken down into considerable detail over a long period of years. The majority of the information requested is either not available centrally or could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, for each of the years 1973 to 1984, he will provide such information as is available to his Department centrally, as to the numbers of hospital beds in each National Health Service region in England, also boards of governors hospitals from 1973 to 1981 and special health authorities from 1982 onwards, which were (a) closed as a result of the closure of complete hospitals, (b) closed in hospitals which were not completely closed, (c) provided as a result of opening new hospitals and (d) provided in additions or modifications to existing hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I see little sensible use for this information which, as I have pointed out to the hon. Member in answering previous questions, provides no worthwhile measure of activity in the National Health Service. However, information we have centrally is as follows.

a. Hospitals approved for complete closure — number of beds involved.

i. 1973 Information not available.

ii. 1974-79 Only the totals for England are given; figures for individual regions are not available. Totals include beds in hospitals approved for only partial closure, for which separate information is not available.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, for each of the years 1973 to 1984, he will provide such information as is available to his Department centrally, as to the average numbers of beds available daily in each National Health Service region in England, boards of governors' hospitals also, from 1973 to 1981, and special health authorities from 1982 onwards, in acute specialties, geriatrics, mental illness, mental handicap and maternity (general practitioner and consultant obstetrics) and the total for all specialties.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is given in the tables. 1984 figures are not yet available. The total number of in-patient cases rose by 17 per cent. from 5,132,000 in 1973 to 6,019,000 in 1983 and the average annual number of in-patient cases treated per available bed increased by 38 per cent. from 12·7 to 17·5.

* "Acute" is defined as all specialties except geriatrics, younger disabled, GP maternity, obstetrics, mental handicap and mental illness.

† Figures prior to 1974 relate to regional hospital boards and thereafter to regional health authorities. Because of NHS restructuring in 1974 and 1982 the regional figures are not strictly comparable over the whole period.

‡ Includes all mental illness specialties.

‖ Includes GP maternity and obstetrics.

Disabled People (Telephones)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many telephones were provided for disabled people by local authorities in 1970-71, and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: The earliest and latest available data on assistance given by local authorities with respect to the provision of telephones are given in the table. The figures include provision for elderly as well as disabled people.

Anorexia Nervosa and Bulimia

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received the results of the studies into the incidence of anorexia nervosa and bulimia conducted at Leeds and Edinburgh universities; and what guidance his Department issues about encouraging better balanced dietary behaviour to avoid these conditions.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Chrysoidine Dye

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what futher meetings have taken place of his Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment since December 1984; whether it has further reviewed the possible links between chrysoidine dye and bladder cancer and especially the effects on anglers who use chrysoidine-dyed maggots; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what further evidence the Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment has sought and examined on the possible clinical and epidemiological effects of chrysoidine dye; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment has held two meetings since December 1984. In the absence of any new evidence at the time relating to the health effects of chrysoidine dye, the committee did not review the advice it had previously given, and to which I referred in my reply to the right hon. Member on 21 January at column 342.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will examine the case control study undertaken by two researchers in Birmingham, a copy of which he has received, concerning coarse fishing and the risk of urothelial cancer and the links with chrysoidine dye; whether he will now ban the use of chrysoidine dye; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are taking medical advice on the report of this study. Any ban on the supply of chrysoidine for use as a maggot-dye would be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Acting on medical advice from this Department, he has already advised anglers to exercise care when using the dye. In the light of the advice we ourselves receive, further advice will be given to my right hon. Friend.

Birth Statistics

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of live births in each of the last 10 years and in total were to unmarried parents in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: The available statistics for England and Wales relate to births which were registered as illegitimate and are as follows:

Year of birth	Percentage of live births which were registered as illegitimate
1975	9·1
1976	9·2
1977	9·7
1978	10·2
1979	10·9
1980	11·8
1981	12·8
1982	14·4
1983	15·8
1984	17·3
1975-84	12·2

Chiropody

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the estimated cost of offering free chiropody services to one-armed war pensioners;

(2) if he will introduce free chiropody services for one-armed war pensioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS Staff (Contractual Obligations)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether National Health Service staff are contractually obliged to clean, to maintain or to repair equipment (a) owned by or (b) managed by private companies in (i) premises owned by the health authority, (ii) premises owned by the private company and (iii) premises owned by the health authority but leased to the private company;

(2) whether National Health Service staff are contractually obliged to care for (a) private patients or (b) National Health Service patients treated with equipment (i) owned by or (ii) managed by private companies in (x) premises owned by the health authority, (y) premises owned by the private company and (z) premises owned by the health authority but leased to the private company;

(3) whether National Health Service staff are contractually obliged to care for National Health Service patients receiving treatment in private clinics.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold centrally information about the contractual obligations of individual National Health Service employees.

Medical Information

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the information routinely collected from health authorities and family practitioner committees; and if he will place a copy of each return form in the Library.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Transplant Operations

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the number of United Kingdom nationals treated for heart transplant operations in (a) Harefield hospital and (b) other National Health Service hospitals since the programme began;

(2) if he will list the number of foreign nationals treated for heart transplant operations in (a) Harefield hospital and (b) other National Health Service hospitals since the programme began;

(3) if he will list the number of United Kingdom nationals treated for heart/lung operations at (a) Harefield hospital and (b) other National Health Service hospitals since the programme began;

(4) if he will list the number of foreign nationals treated for heart/lung operations at (a) Harefield hospital and (b) other National Health Service hospitals since the programme began.

Mr. John Patten: During the period between the start of the current programme in 1979 and 1 April 1985, the most recent date for which information is available centrally, heart and heart/lung transplant operations were performed only at Harefield and Papworth hospitals. The number of patients transplanted were as follows:

	Harefield	Papworth
United Kingdom nationals receiving heart transplant	139	105
Foreign nationals receiving heart transplants	34	1
United Kingdom nationals receiving heart/lung transplants	6	3
Foreign nationals receiving heart/lung transplants	4	—

A small number of these patients underwent a second heart transplant operation. Since 1 April 1985, two United Kingdom nationals have received heart transplants at the Freeman hospital, Newcastle.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give the average length of stay of a heart transplant patient at Harefield hospital;

(2) if he will give the average length of stay of a heart/lung transplant patient at Harefield hospital.

Mr. John Patten: The recently published report "The Costs and Benefits of the Heart Transplant Programmes at Harefield and Papworth Hospitals" gives an average length of stay of 23·8 days from assessment to post transplant discharge for patients receiving heart transplants at Harefield hospital during the first nine months of 1984. No corresponding data are given for patients receiving heart/lung transplants, but we would expect the average length of stay to be considerably greater.

Foreign Nationals (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each health authority the number of foreign nationals treated for the latest available year and not paying charges set out in HC(85)14.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the conditions under which foreign nationals pay charges different from those set out in HC(85)14.

Mr. John Patten: There are no circumstances in which those foreign nationals who are liable to charges pay at rates different from those set out in HC(85)14.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether charges to foreign nationals are determined by individual health authorities when not as set out in HC(85)14.

Mr. John Patten: No. Health authorities have no power to determine charges for overseas visitors.

NHS (Private Contractors)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each year since 1979 the percentage of the expenditure on (a) laundry, (b) domestic cleaning and (c) catering which has been paid to private contractors in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Following is the information requested:

	Laundry	Domestic Cleaning	Catering
	per cent.	per cent.	per cent.
1979-80	14·1	2·4	0·2
1980-81	12·0	2·5	0·3
1981-82	11·7	2·1	0·2
1982-83	11·5	2·0	0·2
1983-84	9·7	2·0	0·2

Notes:
1. The figures are calculated from information shown in the annual accounts submitted to the Department by health authorities in England.
2. Figures for 1984-85 will become available in the autumn.

Private Patients (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a note setting out the formulae and figures used to calculate the 1985-86 charges to private non-resident patients under section 66 of the National Health Service Act 1977.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This has been done.

Pharmaceutical Industry

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department has access to information from any sources on the net return at historic cost for (a) the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry as a whole, and (b) pharmaceutical companies engaged in supplying products to the National Health Service in each year since 1960.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no information about comparative returns on historic costs.

Abortion

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that doctors agreeing to termination of pregnancies and, in particular, late terminations, on grounds of risks of deformity in the foetus, include a specific statement of the anticipated deformity on the relevant form; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Abortion Act requires that where a termination is considered because of risk of foetal deformity, two doctors should be of the opinion that there is a substantial risk that if the child were born it would suffer from such physical or mental abnormalities as to be seriously handicapped. Regulations made under the Act require that the doctor who performs the termination notifies our Chief Medical Officer and provides other information. In the case of terminations carried out because of risk of foetal abnormality, the doctor is required to state the diagnosis or suspected condition.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why his Department collects no figures on the accuracy of the medical diagnosis relating to the grounds on which an abortion is granted.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Regulations made under the Abortion Act require doctors performing abortions to notify them to our Chief Medical Officer and to provide other information, including the medical diagnosis. In cases of foetal abnormality, it would not always be possible to determine whether the condition suspected was in fact present.

Primary Care

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the Green Paper on primary care; and what consideration is being given to the problems of ancillary staffing at health centres, especially in areas of social deprivation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We expect to publish a Green Paper later this year but we have not set ourselves any pre-ordained timetable. The staffing of health centres is a matter for general practitioners or health authorities, depending upon the categories of staff the hon. Member has in mind.

Health Authorities (Crown Immunity)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he has given to health authorities on Crown immunity in National Health Service hospitals and contractors providing services there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (Pay)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give (a) for the period 1979-80 to 1984-85 and (b) for the period 1980-81 to 1984-85 the average increase in pay levels of the following categories of staff: (i) nursing and midwifery, (ii) medical and dental, (iii) professional and technical, (iv) works, (v) maintenance, (vi) administrative and clerical, (vii) ancillary and (viii) all National Health Service directly employed staff, in England.

Mr. John Patten: Relevant information is set out in the table. Figures for total staff are not readily available.

Departmental Staff (Qualifications)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many clerical officers are currently employed in his Department who do not possess a general certificate of education ordinary level pass.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why his Department is not prepared to accept as a qualification a general certificate of education ordinary level pass in English obtained in an examination held in Portugal.

Mr. Whitney: The Civil Service Commission rules on recruitment of clerical staff require Departments, in respect of qualifications in "English" or "English Language" obtained in countries where the mother tongue is not English, to accept only candidates with a GCE "O" level pass in English language awarded by an examining board in the United Kingdom, or an acceptable alternative qualification in English language awarded in this country.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why Mrs. Maria Shah was promoted from clerical assistant to clerical officer in his Department without her possession of a recognised pass in general certificate of education ordinary level English.

Mr. Whitney: During her employment as a casual clerical assistant with the Department Mrs. Shah was successful in an open competition for appointment at clerical officer level. She was offered such an appointment on a conditional basis, pending the usual inquiries regarding health, character, and other factors. The fact that Mrs. Shah did not have the necessary GCE O-level (or equivalent) qualification in English language was, unfortunetely, overlooked at the time. Mrs. Shah subsequently agreed to take English language at "O" level and the result is awaited.

Heating Addition

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what savings he expects in the current year, 1986-87 and 1987-88, respectively, from his decision to discontinue additional payments for central heating to supplementary benefit households in respect of claims made after 5 August 1985;

(2) how many supplementary benefit households he estimates will be in receipt of additions to their benefit for central heating at 31 March 1986, 31 March 1987 and 31 March 1988, respectively, following his decision to discontinue new awards for claims made after 5 August 1985;

(3) how many supplementary benefit households at present receive an addition to their benefit for central heating; and what is the annual cost.

Mr. Newton: At December 1983, the latest date for which figures are available, 1,010,000 supplementary benefit households were in receipt of a central heating addition. At current rates, the total amount included in assessment of benefit as a result of these additions would be about £174 million a year.

The discontinuance of new awards of central heating additions from 5 August 1985 would be forecast to have the following cumulative effects under the existing supplementary benefit scheme:

Year ending 31 March	No. of claimants affected (millions)	Expenditure savings (£ million)
1986	0·2	10
1988	0·4	55

The position after 1 April 1987 would, of course, be subsumed by the proposals for the replacement of the supplementary benefit scheme set out in the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9517 and 9518).

Mr. Forrester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what instructions were issued to benefit officers in 1980 on how to implement the automatic award of heating allowance to people in receipt of mobility allowance; and whether there have been any subsequent changes in those instructions.

Mr. Newton: Instructions to our local offices on implementation of the automatic award of heating additions to supplementary benefit recipients who receive mobility allowance were contained in a Departmental circular issued on 25 July 1980. Various amendments have been made since then and up-to-date instructions are contained in the latest version of the S manual at paragraphs 4321-4336 and circulars S28/84 and S30/84, copies of which are in the Library.

State Earnings-related Pension Scheme

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a breakdown of the estimated cost-savings arising from the proposed phasing out of the state earnings-related pension scheme in each year from 1987 to 2035.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) on 27 June at column 484.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of band earnings (a) a man and (b) a woman on national average earnings would receive in earnings-related pension (additional component) if they had contributed to the state earnings-related pension scheme for (i) 20 years, (ii) 25 years, (iii) 30 years, (iv) 35 years and (v) 40 years.

Mr. Newton: The amount of additional component payable to (a) a man and (b) a woman who had consistently received earnings at a level equivalent to the national average would be (a) 19 per cent. and (b) 17 per cent. if based on national average earnings in the year of retirement after 20 years in the scheme. As the scheme reaches maturity in 20 years, participation in the scheme for periods in excess of that would not affect the relationship between earnings and the additional component.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, under the Green Paper proposals on social security, those with fluctuating earnings who currently create an adequate record of contributions for the state earnings-related pension scheme will be eligible for an occupational pension with employer contributions.

Mr. Newton: We are considering in the course of consultations on the Green Paper how the new pension arrangements should apply to casual workers and those whose earnings only occasionally exceed a minimum level (probably the lower earnings limit for national insurance contributions). An aim in this will certainly be to include in the general requirement those whose earnings would have qualified them for benefit under the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the level for persons retiring in each of the next 15 years, on male manual average earnings, of the additional earnings-related component they will receive if they are contracted into the state earnings-related pension scheme; and if he will estimate the cost each year of crediting in existing pensioners at this level or by some comparable criterion.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 20 May 1985, c. 329-30]: The table gives a broad estimate of the amount of additional earnings-related component that would be paid to a person retiring in each of the next 15 years whose earnings had been at the level of the average for male manual workers for each year since 1978. These amounts are expressed in terms of 1984/85 earnings.

1986-87	13·05
1987-88	14·55
1988-89	16·05
1989-90	17·55
1990-91	19·10
1991-92	20·60
1992-93	22·10
1993-94	23·65
1994-95	25·15
1995-96	26·65
1996-97	28·15
1997-98	29·70
1998-99	31·20
and later	(rounded to nearest 5p)

(Based on new earnings survey full time male manual earnings).

To provide detailed estimates of the total cost for a scheme for crediting in existing pensioners at these levels for each year would incur disproportionate costs but illustrative fugures for the extra expenditure involved, expressed in terms of, 1984-85 prices, can be given for certain years:

1993-94	11½
2003-04	14½

*The final cost would be lower as there would be savings of supplementary benefit and housing benefit which cannot be quantified except at disproportionate cost.

Social Security Review

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what precise evidence he bases the statement in paragraph 1.28 of the Green Paper on "Reform of Social Security" that the number of pensioners is likely to rise by about four million over the next 50 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The statement in paragraph 1.28 of volume 2 of the Green Paper is based on population projections prepared by the Government Actuary in consultation with the Registrars General for the report "Population Projections 1981—2021" published for the Government Statistical Service by HMSO in 1984. Full details of the way the projections were arrived at are given in this publication copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many losers and how many gainers there would be in each of the following categories of supplementary benefit claimants if each supplementary benefit claimant who is (a) over 60 years, (b) unemployed, (c) a single parent, (d) long-term sick or disabled or (e) caring for the sick or disabled, had his or her requirements assessed at the average for that category; what in each case would be the average gain and the average loss; and what in each case would be the maximum gain and the maximum loss.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1985, c. 486-87]: The analysis requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Claimants' entitlement is built up from the present systems of scale rates and additional requirements.

The present scale rates for single claimants who are householders in each of the categories are as follows:

Over 60 years	35·70
Unemployed	28·05
Single parent	*28·05
Sick and disabled	*28·05
Caring for the sick and disabled	†35·70

* Ordinary rate.
† Long term rate.

Any claimant might be entitled to an additional requirement if the qualifying conditions are satisfied. For average amount for each of the additional requirements, I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friends reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 10 May at column 542 as amended in his pursuant reply of 26 June at column 434. For average amounts received by claimants with additional requirements, I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Spicer) on 25 June at column 383-4.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many householders will lose housing benefit completely as a result of the upratings announced in the House on 18 June.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 25 June 1985, c. 386]: It is estimated that 460,000 households will not receive rate rebate that they would otherwise have received following the proposed increase in the housing benefit rates taper above the needs allowance and the real improvement in the dependent child addition to the needs allowance this November. Of these, an estimated 340,000 will no longer receive any housing benefit.

National Insurance

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has made any estimate of the annual cost of changing from an exemption to a threshold system for national insurance contributions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: As we made clear in the Green Paper on Reform of Social Security (vol. 1, paragraph 11.5), it would cost some £6·5 billion a year to convert the existing lower earnings limit into a threshold. Such a change could only be paid for by higher contribution rates.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under what circumstances individuals may make up national insurance contributions which were not collected during the appropriate working years.

Mr. Whitney: If the amount of national insurance contributions paid by an individual in any tax year is insufficient for pensions purposes, he may make up the deficiency by paying voluntary (class 3) contributions.

Contributions in respect of years up to 5 April 1982 had to be paid by the end of the second year after the year in question. From April 1982 the time limit for payment has been six years. If, however, contributions for years from 1983-84 are paid more than two years late they may be charged at a higher rate.

Social Workers

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the new duties which have been imposed on social workers in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John Patten: Over this period, the following Acts have assigned new or modified duties to local authority social services committees and consolidated some of their existing duties:

Children Act 1975
Supplementary Benefits Act 1976 Schedule 5
Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977
National Health Service Act 1977 Schedule 8
Domestic Proceedings and Magistrates' Courts Act 1978
Child Care Act 1980
Foster Children Act 1980
Mental Health Act 1983
Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984
Registered Homes Act 1984

NHS (Blood Supplies)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer of 24 June, Official Report, column 331, what evidence he has that non-National Health Service hospitals may increasingly be obtaining their supplies of blood direct from National Health Service regional blood transfusion centres rather than through the hospital blood banks.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no quantitative evidence. My reply was based on views expressed by staff within the regional transfusion centres.

Disabled People (Aids)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what sources of information on the various aids for the disabled are available to private individuals seeking to purchase equipment for their own use, for doctors and social workers seeking to provide publicly-funded equipment for clients' or patients' use and for National Health Service staff wishing to acquire such aids in bulk for use within their area.

Mr. Newton: There is a wide variety of sources of information about aids and equipment for disabled people but these are not clearly and separately designed for the different classes of user referred to by my hon. Friend. The sources include information available from the Disabled Living Foundation and from many voluntary bodies serving particular disability groups, Reports published by the Department and other bodies on the assessment and evaluation of particular ranges of equipment, manufacturers' own publicity material and information available at aids centres and exhibitions such as NAIDEX.

All these sources are mentioned in the Department's booklet 'Aids for the Disabled' (HB2) a copy of which I am sending to my hon. Friend.

Additional advice and information is available to supplies officers within the National Health Service, from this Department and the particular health regions responsible for procurement policy in aids and equipment.

Departmental Schemes (Study)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what use is being made of computer modelling and expert systems techniques to identify the precise workings of aid, benefit, grant and subsidy schemes within his responsibility.

Mr. Whitney: Computer modelling is used by several areas of the Department including statisticians, economic advisers and the operational research service.

The use of "expert system" is not yet so widespread. The Department is involved, however, with the Government sponsored Alvey programme to develop a demonstrator system for benefit assessment. This programme includes participants from the computer industry as well as several universities.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if under the Green Paper proposals (a) men retiring at 60 years will be credited with contributions towards a full retirement pension at 65 years, (b) women working after 60 years will continue to get a 7 per cent. increase, above the basic pension, for each year worked and (c) women working after 60 years will continue to be exempt from national insurance contributions;

(2) if, under the Green Paper proposals on social security, women will continue to receive the full national insurance basic state pension when they retire at 60 years on the basis of the same contribution conditions as now.

Mr. Newton: The Green Paper makes no proposals for change in relation to the award of national insurance contribution credits for men over the age of 60, the payment of increments for periods of deferred retirement, exemption from contribution liability for women over 60 or the contribution conditions for basic retirement pension. Comments are, however, invited in paragraph 1.80 of volume 2 on how the state pension scheme might be made more flexible, for example with a decade of retirement between ages 60 and 70, without imposing unacceptably high extra costs.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many women retired at 60 years on a full basic state pension in 1983-84 and 1984-85, respectively;

(2) how many men and how many women earned extra retirement pension by deferring retirement to 70 and 65 years, respectively, during 1983-84 and 1984-85; and what was the average size of the increased weekly basic pension.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Idris Pearce

Mr. Silkin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hours in each month Mr. Idris Pearce is employed as property adviser to the National Health Service Board.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Mr. Pearce's firm, Richard Ellis, has agreed to make his services available to our Department for 1½ days a week.

Equipment (Supply)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what account his Department takes in awarding contracts for the supply of equipment of the export potential of competing products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: In awarding contracts for the supply of equipment, the prime factors taken into account by the Department are the suitability of the equipment concerned for the task in hand and value for money. A number of subsidiary factors are also taken into account; these include export potential and other considerations arising from the Government's guidelines on public purchasing.

Local Offices (Opening Times)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he has given to the use of labour-saving benefits from the use of new technology to enable offices of his Department which directly serve the public to remain open in the evenings and at weekends.

Mr. Whitney: Once the benefits of new technology have been felt in local offices in improving the current service, consideration can then be given to widening that service.

St. Helier Hospital, Merton

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services who has been responsible for the cleaning of the St. Helier hospital, Merton, for each of the years 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Merton and Sutton health authority's own domestic staff were responsible for the cleaning of St. Helier hospital for the period from 1982 to 13 January 1985. Responsibility was then taken over by Mediclean, a specialist hospital cleaning service. The health authority anticipate that this change will produce savings of £800,000 a year which they will retain to spend on health services in the district.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many complaints have been received about cleaning standards at St. Helier hospital, Merton.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Merton and Sutton district health authority received a total of seven written complaints about cleaning standards at St. Helier hospital in the three years 1982 to 1984. It has received six written letters of complaint and six letters of praise about the cleaning standards at St. Helier since January of this year.

Legionnaire's Disease (St. Helier Hospital)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of Legionnaire's disease have been reported at St. Helier hospital, Merton.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A single case of legionaire's disease was confirmed on 20 June at St. Helier hospital. We understand it to be an isolated case.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what investigations are being mounted, and by whom, into the reported outbreak of legionnaire's disease at St. Helier hospital, Merton.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since a single case of Legionnaire's disease was confirmed on 20 June at St. Helier hospital detailed investigations have been undertaken by the district medical officer, the consultant hospital microbiologist, who is also the hospital infection officer, and other professional and technical staff of the Merton and Sutton health authority. They have received expert help and advice from the communicable disease surveillance centre, Colindale, which is able to draw on recent experience gained in connection with the outbreak in Staffordshire.

Water samples and specimens from other patients who have been admitted to the renal unit at St. Helier during the past 2-3 months have been sent to public health laboratories at Oxford and Epsom and samples are continuing to be taken for analysis. So far all the results are negative but final results from the initial samples are due this week.

West Midlands

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of disabled citizens who have claimed supplementary benefit in the west midlands region in each single year since 1979 and the number of home help service personnel who have been employed in that region in each single year during the same period.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 21 June 1985, c. 257]: The figures which we collect show the total number of people claiming supplementary benefit who are unable to work through incapacity; no distinction is made between those who are sick and those who are disabled.

The numbers of sick and disabled people claiming supplementary benefit in the West Midlands region in May 1979 and in each succeeding year were:

	Number
1979	12,073
1980	11,814
1981	12,923
1982	14,511
1983	*13,627
1984	15,337

* Because of industrial action in the Department at that time this figure is not wholly reliable.

The number of home help service staff employed by social services departments in the West Midlands region on 30 September 1983 was 5,586·3 (whole-time equivalents). Information for previous years is given in the Department's annual publication entitled "Staff of Local Authority Social Services Departments in England"—copies of which are in the Library.

Drug Abuse (East Berkshire)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients have been admitted to hospitals in the East Berkshire health authority area, suffering from drug abuse or drug related problems for those people aged (a) under 25 years, (b) 25 to 45 years and (c) over 45 years in each of the last five years.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 24 June 1985, c. 337]: The available information is given in the table. Corresponding information for non-psychiatric hospitals and units is not centrally available.

Admissions to mental illness hospitals and units managed by East Berkshire district health authority† with main diagnosis of drug psychosis, drug dependence or non-dependent abuse of drugs.*

Drug Addicts

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people in each of the last five years have been notified to the chief medical officer as addicted to cocaine; and what percentage of total notifications these figures represent;

(2) how many persons notified to the chief medical officer over the last five years specified cocaine as their principal drug addiction.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

The available information for the years 1980 to 1983 is given in the following table; corresponding figures for 1984 are not yet available. In cases where the person is reported as addicted to more than one drug, the notifications do not indicate the principal drug of addiction.

TRANSPORT

Merchant Ships (Defence Use)

9. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the report commissioned by his Department on the availability of British merchant ships for defence use.

Mr. Ridley: A copy of the SEA group report, with any necessary excisions on grounds of confidentiality, will be placed in the Library shortly.

Football Supporters (Travel)

12. Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has met, or has any plans to meet, the Football League and Football Association's representatives to discuss the travelling arrangements for football fans in the light of British Rail's decision not to operate special trains for football fans in future.

Mr. Ridley: I understand that BR has not decided to stop running special trains for football fans. It has decided, as a general rule to withdraw low fares specifically for football fans on sponsored trains. Organized groups will still get a discount on other trains. BR will also encourage clubs to charter more trains. I met the football authorities with the Prime Minister on 12 June.

Coaches (Roll Bars)

14. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation requiring passenger-carrying coaches to be fitted with roll bars to protect occupants in the event of accident.

Mrs. Chalker: I am very pleased to say that, following an initiative by my Department, an international standard on coach roof strength was agreed in June by the United Nations expert group on vehicle construction. This will require roll-over bars or other measures to strenghthen the coach framework. We shall be introducing regulations as soon as we can to apply the standard to all new coaches registered in Britain.

Motor Cycles (Noise)

15. Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take to improve the standards and enforcement of regulations covering noise generated by motor cycles and trial bikes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We are pressing in the Community for stricter standards of permitted noise from new motor cycles. The Construction and Use Regulations were amended last year to require replacement silencers in motor cycles first registered from the beginning of 1985 to meet a new British standard. The regulations have always prohibited motor cycles on public roads from making an excessive noise or having an inadequate silencer.

Oxford Circus (Fire)

16. Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received concerning the implications of the fire at Oxford Circus on 23 November 1984.

Mr. Ridley: The only representations I have received are eight questions from the hon. Lady and five questions from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks).

Cheddar (Signposting)

17. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will put exit signs to Cheddar on the M5 motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: On 17 April last I announced a review of all direction signs, including signs to tourist destinations. We shall be looking at ways of providing better guidance to attractions such as Cheddar for the increasing numbers of tourists using the motorways. In the meantime I have asked my officials to discuss the possibility of signing Cheddar from the M5 with Avon and Somerset county councils.

British Rail (Recruitment Policy)

18. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet received a copy of the Equal Opportunities Commission's report on British Rail's recruitment and employment policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. Nor would my right hon. Friend expect to see the confidential draft of a report requested by the British Railways Board and which has not yet been published.

Buses (Deregulation)

20. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received concerning the effect of deregulation on the scope and extent of direct bus subsidies from local authorities.

Mr. David Mitchell: A large number, many of which have failed to take account of the beneficial impact competition will have on costs and on patronage.

Motor Cyclists (Safety)

21. Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he proposes to take to improve motor cyclists' safety standards.

Mr. Ridley: I am reviewing all aspects of motor cyclist safety in the light of the achievements of the measures introduced under the Transport Act 1981 and in the wider context of the inter-departmental review of road safety policy. It is too early to give detailed proposals.

Christmas Drink and Drive Campaign

22. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is now in a position to report on the 1984 Christmas drink and drive campaign; and what plans he has for Christmas 1985, with particular reference to the use of random testing.

Mrs. Chalker: The evaluation of the 1984 campaign has not yet been completed. I shall be considering our future plans in the light of this evaluation and all other relevant factors.

Trunk Roads (London)

23. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has of increased traffic congestion on trunk roads in the London area over the last five years; and what measures he is considering to reduce such congestion.

Mrs. Chalker: Congestion is self evidently worse during peak hours and in central London and town centre areas.

Data collected on the Departmental's roads in connection with specific schemes shows a continuing slow increase in congestion over the last five years, although the M25 has already had beneficial effects in certain areas.

Implementation of the schemes already in the London trunk road programme will deal with most of the remaining trouble spots.

Birmingham Airport

24. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made in the context of the White Paper on airports policy as to the projected passenger throughput in Birmingham airport by 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Regional airports are expected to grow at an average annual rate in excess of 4 per cent. to the end of the century. If Birmingham international achieves an average level of growth, if would be handling more than 2·1 million passengers a year by 1990. The Government are anxious to encourage the use of Birmingham and other regional airports, and stand ready to discuss with regional airport authorities the opportunities for developing new routes and their plans for development.

Tyne and Wear (Metro)

25. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Tyne and Wear passenger transport executive to discuss the future of the Metro; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I met a delegation from Tyne and Wear county council, which was accompanied by the director general and certain other officers of the PTE, to discuss the Tyne and Wear metro on 14 May. Discussions about the metro are continuing between my officials and those of the passenger transport executive, and I will be ready to meet Tyne and Wear representatives again whenever it appears such a meeting would be useful.

Liner Conferences

36. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made towards the United Kingdom and other European countries becoming parties to the United Nations convention on a code of conduct for liner conferences.

Mr. Ridley: The United Kingdom has acceded to this convention on 28 June together with Denmark, Norway and Sweden. The Federal Republic of Germany and the Netherlands are already parties. The convention, together with the EC regulations known as the Brussels package, steers a course between competing claims of different countries. Those countries which wish to reserve a fixed proportion of conference cargoes may do so while those countries, like the United Kingdom, which wish to ensure that commercial principles continue to govern cargo sharing between their lines have retained that right.

It is important that British industry has access to regular shipping services at competitive rates and we have taken steps to ensure that the code's provisions are not misused to dampen competition. Our accession to the code is on the condition that we will only be bound by the convention while our trading partners allow non-conference lines to compete in trades serving the United Kingdom. The code also provides a welcome enhancement in the rights of shippers and their organisations in dealing with liner conferences.

Singapore Airlines (Manchester)

Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received following his decision to allow Singapore Airlines to open new services to Manchester.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have received a number of indications of approval of the decision to allow Singapore Airlines to operate services to Manchester, including one from the chairman of the Manchester International Airport Authority, who has expressed publicly his delight and appreciation of the decision.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport why the agreement for direct flights between Manchester international airport and Singapore by Singapore Airlines does not take effect until 1 April 1986.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The agreement that the new service between Manchester and Singapore could start from April 1986 reflected the wishes of SIA.

33. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Transport what communication his Department has had with Singapore Airlines following the granting of permission to the airline to open new services from Manchester to Singapore in April 1986.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There has so far been no need for any further communications with Singapore Airlines in this matter.

34. Mr. Conlan asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with the progress being made in achieving a commercial agreement between British Airways and Singapore Airlines upon which his permission for the new Singapore Airlines services to Manchester is contingent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Yes. The position was set out in the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Sir W. Clegg), on 26 June at column 427.

Road Accidents

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people died in road accidents in the United Kingdom and what information he has as to the comparable figures for (a) France, (b) Italy, (c) Holland and (d) West Germany in 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: The available information is given in the table:

	Road deaths	Deaths per 100,000 motor vehicles
Great Britain*	5,514	27·34
France†‖	12,728	52·72
Holland‡	1,710	29·77
Italy‡‖	8,245	32·12
West Germany	11,732	40·61

* 1984 figures (provisional).
† 1983 figures.
‡ 1982 figures.
‖ Figures adjusted to comply with GB definition.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of total pedestrian casualties were between the ages of 10 and 16 years in 1983 and 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is given in the table.

Ten to Sixteen year-old pedestrian casualties as a percentage of total pedestrian casualties: GB

	Fatal Per cent	Serious Per cent	Slight Per cent	All Per cent
1983	10	22	24	23
1984	9	22	25	24

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many persons between the ages of one and 34 years were killed in road accidents in 1984; and what percentage of total fatalities the figure represents.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is given in the table:

	Road Deaths: GB: 1984
A: Aged 1-34	2,950
B: All	5,514

A as a percentage of B 54

Road Safety

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish his response to the Transport Committee's report on road safety.

Mrs. Chalker: As soon as possible.

M25

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that both sections of the M25 between Reigate and Wisley are opened simultaneously; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The contract completion dates for the Wisley-Leatherhead and Leatherhead-Reigate sections are 5 and 26 August 1985, respectively. I shall decide when to open these sections after I have considered the views of the local authorities. I shall write to my hon. Friend in due course.

26. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will report progress on the construction of the M25 motorway between the A1 and A41, including reconstruction work of the M1 motorway in this area.

Mrs. Chalker: All four main contracts for this last section of the M25 are making good progress. In conjunction with the police, the contractors and the Hertfordshire county council, we are seeking to ensure that so far as possible work on those contracts does not add to congestion during the reconstruction of M1 junction 8 which begins tomorrow. I do not expect their completion to be affected as a result.

Sharelga

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department's records of fishing vessel losses at sea include any reference to the sinking of the Irish trawler Sharelga; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department only records losses of foreign registered fishing vessels at sea when it has inquired into the circumstances of the loss. Incidents on the high seas involving foreign registered fishing vessels and submarines do not fall within the responsibilities of my Department. No reference to the loss of the Irish trawler Sharelga therefore appears in our records.

M62

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work to start on building a fourth lane on the M62; and how long he expects this work will take to complete.

Mrs. Chalker: In the recent report "National Roads England 1985" a crawler lane for M62 is listed in the programme for April 1989 onwards. At present it is too early to make a more precise forecast of when work can start or how long it will take to complete.

London Regional Transport

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport above what cost per project London Regional Transport is obliged to put contracts out for tender.

Mr. Ridley: There are no such cost limits. In the objectives I set LRT and published last July, I said that I would expect LRT to secure its investment

"at the best price through competition wherever possible".

But detailed decision about individual contracts are for LRT's Board and management to take.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the London fire brigade has floor plans for London Regional Transport stations as a matter of policy.

Mr. Ridley: This is a matter for the chairman of LRT, and I suggest that the hon. Lady makes inquiry of him.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will discuss with the chairman of London Regional Transport the introduction of a procedure for project management to ensure compliance with the existing licensing system for storage of materials on stations.

Mr. Ridley: I suggest that the Hon. Lady writes to the chairman of LRT herself.

Bypass (Leadenham)

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is the latest estimate of the cost of constructing a bypass around the north of the village of Leadenham;

(2) what is the latest estimate of the cost of constructing a relief road or roads through the village of Leadenham.

Mrs. Chalker: The latest estimated cost of constructing a bypass to the north of Leadenham is £3·0 million at 1984 prices. This should not be compared with earlier figures, as the draft plans have been reviewed in the light of the latest data and standards. The estimated cost of constructing a relief road through Leadenham is £2·9 million at 1984 prices.

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information is available to his Department about road accidents on the A17 in the vicinity of Leadenham and casualties arising in each of the last 15 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The information readily available is based on the Department's computer record which contains accident data on the A17, two miles either side of Leadenham for the last three years as follows:

	Number of accidents	Number of casualties
1981	8	14
1982	10	13
1983	7	15

I have already promised to let the hon. Member have further information about accidents when it has been received.

Seat Belts

27. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report which he has commissioned from the London School of Economics about the statistical effects of the seat belt regulations.

Mrs. Chalker: Some time this summer, in time to be published alongside the Department's own report. I hope to publish both in the late summer.

Air Travel Reserve Fund

28. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the level of funding of the air travel reserve fund.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The level of the fund currently stands at around £20 million.

Motorists (Property Damage Insurance)

29. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to make it compulsory for motorists to take out insurance against third party damage to property.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on 11 June at column 420.

Snow Hill Tunnel

30. Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has now reached a decision on British Rail proposals for the Snow Hill tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have today written to the chairman of British Rail, giving approval for BR's plans to reinstate the Snow Hill link, and for the construction of new electric multiple units to operate services through the tunnel. The rolling stock cascade resulting from the introduction of these new vehicles will also benefit rail travellers on suburban services to both Liverpool Street and Euston. The scheme as a whole will cost £54 million.

Public Bus Services (Pension Schemes)

31. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received regarding the future of pension schemes for employees in the public bus sector.

Mr. David Mitchell: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 4 June at column 151.

A1(M) Rotherham—Boroughbridge

32. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve traffic flow on the A1(M) north from Rotherham to Boroughbridge.

Mrs. Chalker: A flyover is being constructed at Barnsdale Bar in south Yorkshire to replace an existing ground level junction.

Proposals for improvement of the A1 north of Bramham Crossroads to Wetherby were considered at a public inquiry held in 1982 and 1983 and I expect to announce the decision during the next few months. A scheme is in preparation for widening the A1 from Wetherby to Dishforth.

The need for measures to improve traffic flow on other sections of the A1 is being kept under regular review.

Trunk Roads (Mobile Canteens)

35. Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish details of the Government's policy with regard to the siting of mobile canteens without permission in lay-bys on trunk roads.

Mrs. Chalker: Our policy is to tolerate mobile canteens in safe locations on trunk roads because they provide a useful service to road users. Canteens are, however, not allowed if they cause a road safety hazard, create problems for traffic flows, interfere with the purpose for which the lay-bys are provided, or become an environmental nuisance.

International Airports

13. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to which European cities operate (a) three and (b) four international airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Paris has three airports, or four counting Beauvais. Milan has two airports, with a third, Bergamo, which is used occasionally for charter traffic. Since the throughput of other European airports is so much lower than ours, a better comparison would be with the United States, where Los Angeles and New York each has five airports.

Sub-post Offices (Vehicle Licences)

19. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the role of sub-post offices in issuing vehicle licences.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Sub-post offices form an essential part of the vehicle relicensing service, especially in rural areas. At present about a quarter of all licence renewals are carried out at over 1,500 sub-post offices throughout the country. Further improvements will be made to the service following the recent agreement I reached with the chairman of the Post Office under which an extra 500 sub-post offices, mainly in rural areas, will be added to the network over the next three years.

Northolt Airport

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many civil aircraft flights have taken place to and from Northolt airport in each year since 1955; what are his future projections; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I have been asked to reply.

Figures as far back as 1955 are not available except at disproportionate cost. The number of civil flights each year since 1965 is as follows:

	Number
1965	1,292
1966	1,216
1967	1,230
1968	1,006
1969	1,053
1970	1,454
1971	1,522
1972	1,649
1973	1,706
1974	2,689
1975	3,071
1976	3,248
1977	*1,924
1978	2,453
1979	2,677
1980	2,689
1981	3,660
1982	4,331
1983	3,140
1984	3,414

* the runway was shut for 4 months in this year

On present trends, the figure for 1985 will be about 3,800. Although we are attempting to facilitate the use of Northolt by business aircraft as far as is consistent with defence requirements, we do not anticipate any major change in the volume of civil traffic.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive (Contracts)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Northern Ireland Housing Executive contracts were awarded after (a) open tendering and (b) select list procedure in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive, who has advised me that no building contracts were let after open tendering. The numbers of contracts let to firms selected [illegible] tendering from the approved list of contractors were as follows:

	Number
1982-83	1,032
1983-84	1,025
1984-85	1,399

Local Enterprise Development Unit Offices (Upper Galwally)

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much was spent on office furniture for the Upper Galwally office of the Local Enterprise Development Unit; who were the manufacturers of this furniture; and what was the country of origin.

Dr. Boyson: The total value of the contract for the supply of office furniture was £30,000. The suppliers were as follows in descending order of contract size:

1. Hille Furniture—Manufactured in England
2. Scandia Furniture—Manufactured in Denmark*
3. Seid Seating—Manufactured in Denmark*
4. Tract Seating—Manufactured in England*
5. Casual Seating—Manufactured in Northern Ireland*

* Upholstery fabric provided from Northern Ireland.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland have been in receipt of housing benefit in each of the last two years.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is not possible to provide the information requested as the number of recipients is continuously changing. The total number of people in receipt of housing benefit in Northern Ireland on a given date in each of the last two years is as follows:

	Numbers (rounded)
March 1984	192,900
March 1985	189,600

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland have been in receipt of supplementary benefit in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is not possible to provide the information requested as the numbers of recipients are continuously changing. The total number of people in receipt of supplementary benefit in Northern Ireland on a given date in each of the last five years is as follows:

	Number
7 May 1985	182,133
8 May 1984	176,461
10 May 1983	169,434
11 May 1982	155,958
17 February 1981*	133,965

* Information in respect of 12 May 1981 is not available because of industrial action.

Scallop Fishing Industry

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his up-to-date assessment of the state of the scallop fishing industry in Northern Ireland; and if he is still satisfied that it is under no threat from fishing boats based outside Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: A small number of Northern Ireland fishing vessels devote most of their fishing effort to scallops with additionally some smaller boats fishing on a seasonal and localised basis. Fishing on the scallop beds adjacent to the Northern Ireland coast has been monitored closely since the closure on 1 June of beds elsewhere in the north Irish Sea.

Mr. Peter Kelly

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why Peter Kelly of Dungannon had to wait 12 years to receive financial compensation for brain damage caused by cardiac arrest during an appendicitis operation; how much compensation was paid to him; why liability was not admitted; on how many previous occasions since 1979 sums larger than £100,000 have been paid by health and social services boards following similar settlements without admission of liability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Southern health and social services board took no part in the settlement which was negotiated between the plaintiffs and the insurers of the doctors involved and I am unable to comment on the amount involved.

There have been no occasions since 1979 when sums in excess of £100,000 have been paid by health and social services boards following similar incidents without admissions of liability.

Schools (Newry and Armagh)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what are the numbers of pupils attending each primary school in Newry and Armagh constituency;

(2) what has been the number of pupils attending each primary school in the Newry and Armagh constituency in each of the past five years;

(3) what are the numbers of pupils attending each secondary and grammar school in the Newry and Armagh constituency;

(4) what was the number of pupils attending each secondary and grammar school in the Newry and Armagh constituency in each of the last five years.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the pupil to teacher ratio in each secondary and grammar school in the Newry and Armagh constituency.

Mr. Scott: As at January 1984, the pupil-teacher ratios were as follows:

School	Pupil-Teacher Ratio
Newtownhamilton	14·2:1
Tandragee Junior High	16·6:1
Markethill High	17·4:1
Armagh Secondary	16·2:1

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State Northern Ireland what was the cost of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in each calendar year 1983 and 1984 giving separately figures for (a) salary and benefits, (b) transport and communication, (c) new construction, (d) other costs, (e) total gross expenditure and (f) total net expenditure after deduction of receipts.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 28 June 1985, c. 503]: The information is available only in respect of financial years and is as follows:

	1 April 1983— 31 March 1984 £000	1 April 1984— 31 March 1985 £000
Salaries and benefits	204,879	226,328
Transport and communications	14,141	12,133
New construction	7,641	8,996
Other costs	24,811	26,758
Total gross expenditure	251,473	274,216
Total net expenditure after reduction of receipts	236,027	257,506

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Staff Grading Review

Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, when the review of the grades of House staff began; when it will end; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Beith: A review by the Commission's staff inspector of the grading and pay structure of staff in the House Departments was begun in December 1982. Fourteen reports, covering various aspects of the organisation and staffing structure of the Departments, have so far been presented to the Commission and released to management, unions and staff for their comments. The Commission has asked the staff inspector to present his recommendations on the grading and pay linkages of all levels of staff by the end of June.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy Sources

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has received the recommendations of his Advisory Council on Research and Development on his programme for the development of renewable energy sources; what will be spent on the programme during 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy and I have recently received the recommendations from the chairman of ACORD arising from its review, and we have accepted both the specific objectives of the programme and its future content.

I have placed the recommendations in the Libraries of the House, together with supporting documents, as I undertook to do in reply to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on 8 May, at column 424.

The major programmes on wind power and geothermal hot dry rocks will continue. They will be further reviewed when experience is available from the wind-powered generators under construction on Orkney and at Carmarthen bay, and when the present phase of the geothermal experiment at Rosemanowes in Cornwall is complete.

I agree that our present programme of research and development into passive solar design of buildings is important and justified. I have been glad to note ACORD's recognition of its economic attractiveness, and the need to involve the private sector in its application.

The biofuels programme will continue, and this reflects especially the economic potential of waste as a fuel. Support for small-scale hydro-power technology will also continue.

Studies into the private financing of the Severn tidal power scheme continue, and I await their outcome. I have accepted ACORD's advice to discontinue work on wave power and geothermal aquifers in order to concentrate resources into more promising technologies. However, on wave power in particular, I recognise that it will be important for the Department to be receptive to new ideas which might succeed in achieving the major cost reductions necessary to make it a worthwhile source of power. Technical reports on active solar heating (on which work was discontinued following the 1982 review) and on wave power are being placed in the Libraries of the House.

A detailed technical report on the work on geothermal aquifers will also be prepared by the energy technology support unit and published. With regard to geothermal aquifers, I have decided after careful consideration not to proceed with the geothermal heating scheme at Southampton because the limited potential of this resource in the United Kingdom, which has now been demonstrated, does not now justify such a project.

The estimated expenditure by my Department on renewable energy research and development in 1985-86 is £14 million.

Energy Ministers Council

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement about the meeting of the European Communities Council of Energy Ministers on 20 June.

Mr. Peter Walker: My hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) and I represented the United Kingdom at the Energy Ministers Council on 20 June.

British industry will be able to benefit from a share in European Community aid worth some £300 million to be allocated to developing new ways of producing energy and using energy more efficiently, and to developing improved oil technology.

The Council agreed to provide £216 million to extend the Community's energy demonstration projects scheme for four more years from the end of this year when the scheme was due to expire. In the past British firms have gained around £55 million from the scheme, and I expect them to bid strongly in the coming years.

The Council also agreed to provide £84 million over four years for projects to develop new technology in the hydrocarbons sector. This will be available after the current round of bids ends this year. British firms have received £57 million under the present scheme since it began in 1973, and the expected technological advances on the UKCS in the coming years should boost our prospects for additional Community aid.

Ministers held another discussion on the growth in trade of refined oil products. We agreed that additional supplies from the middle east and north Africa could be absorbed into world markets, provided that their impact was not concentrated on particular regions. The aim should be to maintain or create conditions where the additional imports would fall equitably in all markets.

Commissioner Mosar said that he hoped shortly to table a new Commission proposal to govern the payment of aids by member states to their coal industries. I emphasised that such a proposal would have to recognise the different industrial, employment and social conditions pertaining in each of the member states concerned, and leave to those member states the task of devising arrangements best suited to their own situations.

Whale and Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Energy what whale or turtle products have been purchased by his Department during the past five years.

Mr. Peter Walker: This information is not readily available.

TRANSPORT

Buses

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will publish the Government's response to the report from the Transport Committee on the buses White Paper.

Mr. Ridley: The Government have today published their response to the second report from the House of Commons' Transport Committee.

I am grateful to the Transport Committee for its detailed consideration of the Government's bus policy. There is much common ground between us. We agree on the need for change to halt the decline in bus services. The Committee recognises that competition is the key to improving efficiency and halting that decline.

There can be no doubt that the Government must take action. Thirty years ago 42 per cent. of all journeys were by bus; today the figure is just 8 per cent. During the last 10 years there has been a 28 per cent. fall in ridership. Yet everyone agrees that bus services are vital, especially to elderly people, and the less well-off.

I do not believe that the Committee's proposed solution —comprehensive competitive franchising—is the right one. That system would continue to restrict the introduction of new services; it would not maintain pressure on the industry's rising costs; it would perpetuate the practice of overcharging passengers on more popular services which is one of the principal causes of the industry's decline.

The bus industry needs to be opened up to full competition so that operators can serve their passengers. That will provide the stimulus for efficiency which other industries regard as normal, and the impetus for better services which the passengers have a right to expect. The form of competition proposed in the Transport Bill is the best way of achieving that. We are proposing to give passengers the full benefits of competition while retaining controls over safety, and providing for social need through concessionary fares and local authority revenue support. This is the best solution for the industry and for passengers.

Channel Fixed Link

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements are being made for the assessment of proposals from promoters of a Channel fixed link when these are received at the end of October.

Mr. Ridley: The assessment of proposals for a Channel fixed link will be carried out jointly by the British and French Governments. To assist the British Government with this task I intend to appoint consultants in the following fields:

a. engineering: to report upon all engineering aspects of the proposed structures, other than inland works infrastructure, including feasibility and safety of construction; design and construction standards, operational and equipment standards, quality assurance and inspection arrangements; security maintenance requirements, and design life; cost and time estimates and provision for contingencies; adequacy of risk analysis with regard to fire, explosions, shipping collisions and so on and provision for emergencies; traffic capacity, management and surveillance. In view of the diversity of the possible proposals, I shall be willing to consider appointing seperate consultants for each of the main types of structure (bridges, bored tunnels and immersed tubes): and also separate consultants for tunnel operations equipment.

b. overall programme and capital cost analysis: including appraisal of project capital costs and timing and effectiveness of the proposed project management arrangements in ensuring that the construction project can be finished on cost and schedule;

c. hydrology: to appraise the promoters' assessment of the effects upon the sea-bed;

d. environmental impact: to appraise the promoters' environmental impact assessments;

e. co-ordination: to advise the Government on the overall co-ordination of the assessment.

Separate arrangements are being made for the appointment of a merchant bank as financial advisers to the Government during the assessment.

Detailed advice to applicants is being made available by my Department today.

Cycling

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of his Department's total capital budget for 1984-85 was used for expenditure on cycling matters.

Mrs. Chalker: Some 70 per cent. of central Government transport expenditure of £1·14 billion (excluding subsidies to transport industries) by my Department in 1984-85 was capital expenditure. During this period £187,129 was allocated to innovative cycle schemes and to schemes in the cycle route programme. Figures are not available (1) for staff or administrative costs devoted to cycling at HQ or the Transport and Road Research Laboratory; (2) for the totality of cycling expenditure accepted for transport supplementary grant; or (3) for cycle elements of trunk road improvement schemes.

Vehicle Testing

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from smaller garages about the effect on their viability of the introduction of the new vehicle testing regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have received letters from garages of all sizes worried about the new conditions of appointment. When they come to examine them closely, most garages will find that meeting the new conditions will not be as difficult nor as expensive as they fear.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there are any plans to increase the charge made for a Ministry of Transport test.

Mrs. Chalker: The fees were last increased on 1 July 1985 and I shall not be reviewing them again till next year.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report full details of the new regulations for Ministry of Transport testing.

Mrs. Chalker: As the new conditions of appointment are lengthy and complex, I have placed copies in the Library of the House, instead.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will extend to eight years the period within which Ministry of Transport examiners must comply with the new regulations.

Mrs. Chalker: No. I believe that the five years allowed give a reasonable period for examiners to make any necessary alterations.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from (a) the motoring organisations and (b) chief constables about the effect on safety of the old Ministry of Transport regulations.

Mr. Chalker: The Automobile Association made representations about the content of the test. Nothing was received about the old conditions of appointment from either the motoring organisations or chief constables.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport with whom responsibility for funding rail services subject to section 20 agreements will rest within the area of a district council which has seceded from the proposed public transport joint boards to be established in the event of abolition of the metropolitan county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: This would depend on the arrangements made for any secession. I would normally expect a district council which took on responsibility for bus services to remain part of the joint board in respect of local rail services. But individual circumstances might argue for different treatment.

A17 (Leadenham)

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's most recent estimate of the number of vehicles in any 24-hour period passing through Leadenham along the A17 road.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall answer this question shortly.

SCOTLAND

Skiing Areas

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria were used by the Countryside Commission for Scotland in selecting consultants to carry out an environmental study of existing skiing areas; what firm has been selected; and for what reasons.

Mr. Ancram: The placing of contracts with consultants, under the powers given to commission research in the Countryside (Scotland) Act 1967, is a matter for decision by the Countryside Commission for Scotland without reference to me. I am therefore asking the chairman of the commission to write to the hon. Member with the information as soon as possible.

World Heritage

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made with the designation of world heritage sites in Scotland, under the terms of the world heritage convention; and which sites are under consideration.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend is considering a number of sites in Scotland to be put forward this year to the World Heritage Committee. An announcement will be made in due course.

Skiing

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to respond to the report of the Scottish Affairs Committee on the Highlands and Islands Development Board, with particular reference to its conclusions on the future of skiing in the Cairngorms.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend's response to the Committee on Scottish Affairs was published on 18 June. Paragraph 27 deals with skiing development on Cairngorm.

Acid Rain

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if any of the sites at which trees were examined for signs of acid rain damage in 1984 showed damage.

Mr. John MacKay: A proportion of the plantations surveyed in 1984 for the purpose of detecting air pollution damage revealed some degree of crown thinning: in no case, however, did such thinning appear to be due to air pollution and none of the stands showed symptoms of the type of damage ascribed to this cause in Germany. A copy of the Forestry Commission's press release reporting the results of the survey was placed in the Library of the House on 5 March 1985. A full report of the survey will be published shortly by the Forestry Commission.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

South Africa

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current value of United Kingdom investments in South Africa; and if he will compare this with the equivalent figures in real terms in 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: Information is available only in respect of the book value of United Kingdom direct investment in South Africa at end 1981, which was £2,826 million.

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value in real terms and in volume terms of United Kingdom exports to and imports from South Africa in each of the last 10 years; and what were the principal categories in each case.

Mr. Fletcher: Volume data for individual countries are not available. Information relating to value is as follows:

Table 1:

Sale of Goods (Pricing)

Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if it remains the Government's intention to introduce legislation in the next Session to make provision for a general duty not to apply misleading descriptions as to price in connection with the sale of goods.

Mr. Fletcher: The Government intend to introduce legislation as soon as parliamentary time is available.

Glanford and Scunthorpe

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance his Department has rendered to Glanford and Scunthorpe since June 1983 in the form of grants from budgets within his reponsibility or obtained through the European Community, describing the nature of the grant in each case, the sums of money involved, the number of companies assisted in each case and the number of jobs created thereby.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not fully available in the form required. The figures quoted are for the Scunthorpe employment office area for the period 1 June 1983 to 31 March 1985:

	Payment of Regional Development Grants over £25,000	Offers of Selective Assistance under Sections 7 and 8 of the Industrial Development Act 1982

* Section 7 Assistance only.

Details of assistance from the European regional development fund can only be given on a regional basis at present. No offers have been made under the support for innovation scheme during the period quoted.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many factory units, giving the floor space in each case, English Industrial Estates have constructed in Glanford and Scunthorpe since 1981; what is the total cost of construction; and how many have been occupied, by how many companies and how many jobs created.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Whale and Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what whale or turtle products have been purchased by his Department during the past five years.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Commercial Counterfeiting

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received regarding commercial counterfeiting, especially concerning Scotch whisky; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Representations are received from time to time about the counterfeiting of various products. So far as Scotch whisky is concerned, representations have been received in relation to the labelling and description of whisky on sale in Japan and Korea. The representations are being pursued both bilaterally and through the EEC Commission.

Mechanical Engineering Products

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the average value per tonne of total United Kingdom imports of mechanical engineering products; and what information he has as to how this figure compares with the average value per tonne of total imports of mechanical engineering products into France, West Germany, Italy and Sweden in the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1983;

(2) what was the average value per tonne of total United Kingdom exports of mechanical engineering products; and what information he has as to how this figure compares with the average value per tonne of total exports of mechanical engineering products from France, West Germany, Italy and Sweden in the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1983.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 3]: Data for 1960 are not readily available. The figures for the other years are in the table.

Computer Software

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his current assessment of the share which the domestic software industry has of the national market in the United Kingdom; and what equivalent information he has about the share of the national markets taken by the respective domestic markets in France, Italy and Germany.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 5.]: No figures are available for imports and it is not possible to estimate with any accuracy the share of the United Kingdom market held by the United Kingdom domestic software industry. Nor are share figures available for other European markets. The United Kingdom computer services industry produced revenues of £2·12 billion in 1984.

PRIME MINISTER

Rural Communities (Government Policy)

Q128. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister what plans she has to consider future representations from Wales on the impact of Government policies on rural communities.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has well-defined responsibilities for rural communities in Wales and for the handling of representations about relevant Government policy.

Brecon

Q133. Mr. Ashton asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Brecon.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 2 July.

Mr. Wallace asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 2 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 2 July.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 2 July.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 2 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be attending a dinner given by the United States ambassador to mark the 200th anniversary of diplomatic relations between our two countries.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crown Courts (Appeals)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many appeals to the Crown court against custodial sentences imposed on juveniles there were in the most recent convenient year; and what proportion of these resulted in a reduced sentence.

Mr. Mellor: The information on appeals to the Crown court against sentences of detention centre or youth custody is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables", (vol. 4, table S4.8c-f of the issue for 1983): Information on appeals against other custodial sentences imposed on juveniles could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many known heroin addicts there were in the Bradford area in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not yet available. The currently available information on notifications of narcotic drug addicts in 1984 was given in the reply to a question from my hon. Friend for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 11 June 1985, at columns 394-95.

Shotguns

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received advocating stricter controls on shotguns and proposing that they should be numbered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received representations from various sources, including hon. Members, local authority associations, local authorities and police authorities and members of the public. Only a few of these specifically refer to numbering, but many suggest that section 1 of the Firearms Act 1968 should be extended so as to cover long-barrelled shotguns, which would in effect necessitate the introduction of a numbering system. My right hon. and learned Friend continues to keep the law on shotguns under close review, but we have no plans at present to introduce a numbering requirement.

Miners' Strike (Policing Costs)

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to additional costs incurred in Derbyshire by the policing of the miners' strike; to what other police authorities money is owed; by what mechanism these funds may be paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I understand that up to 31 March the Derbyshire police authority had incurred estimated additional expenditure of some £9·85 million resulting from the policing of the dispute in its area by the Derbyshire constabulary. I do not have information on the total sum which the authority owes to the 31 police authorities whose forces assisted the Derbyshire constabulary. Thirteen of those authorities have asked me to determine in accordance with section 14(4) of the Police Act 1964, the contribution to be paid to them by the Derbyshire police authority. The authority has already been notified of the determination of £428,661.37 made in relation to certain additional costs incurred by Cambridgeshire police authority. Other determinations will follow shortly.

The Derbyshire police authority is responsible for paying those authorities whose forces supplied mutual aid. The Government have, however, made available a special payment of 40 per cent., in addition to normal police grant, of approved additional expenditure, including the cost of mutual aid, incurred as a result of the dispute. Advances of grant are made when requested. No authority will be required to find from its own resources more than the product of three-quarters of a penny rate. Derbyshire has already passed this threshold.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pig Disease Eradication Fund Ltd.

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he intends to give extra financial aid to the Pig Disease Eradication Fund Ltd. to meet the costs of the Aujeszky's disease eradication scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: We had full discussions with representatives of PDEF on 17 June about their request for Government assistance towards the cost of the Aujeszky's disease control and eradication scheme. My right hon. Friend confirmed, as he had done already to the House of Commons Agriculture Committee, that the scheme had been undertaken at the express wish of producers and on the firm understanding that they would bear the costs of compensation and associated costs. In these circumstances no extra Government money could be made available to PDEF.

WALES

Degree Courses

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many students of the Polytechnic of Wales received first-class honours, 2A, 2B or third in accountancy in 1975, 1980 and 1984.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Polytechnic of Wales began offering an honours degree course in accountancy and finance in 1980. In 1984 the results were:

	Number
First Class	0
2(i)	3
2(ii)	4
Third	0

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many students of the Polytechnic of Wales received first-class honours, 2A, 2B or third in research and development in engineering in 1975, 1980 and 1984.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Polytechnic of Wales does not offer degree courses which specialise in research and development in engineering. Its honours degree courses in chemical engineering, electrical engineering, civil engineering and mechanical engineering contain elements of research and development work. Results from these courses for the years in question were as follows:

	First Class	2(i)	2(ii)	Third
1975	7	14	9	3
1980	8	13	22	8

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales which universities or colleges in Wales, other than the Polytechnic of Wales, offer courses in marketing, marketing and research, accountancy, and research and development in engineering.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The University College at Aberystwyth offers a BSc in agricultural and food marketing. No other university colleges or higher education colleges in Wales provide degree courses specifically in marketing or market research, or in research and development in engineering. There are degree courses offered at the University Colleges at Cardiff and Swansea and at UWIST which include an element of marketing and market research; and engineering degree courses which include some research and development work are offered at the University Colleges at Bangor, Cardiff, Swansea, at UWIST and at the Gwent college of higher education. Degree courses in accountancy are offered at the University Colleges at Aberystwyth, Bangor and Cardiff and at UWIST.

Housing Renewal

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales to what extent his Department will participate in the work of the urban housing renewal unit launched by the Government on 19 June.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Department is actively pursuing the objectives and initiatives which are to be promoted by the urban housing renewal unit. Our officials will be in close touch with the work of the unit and will draw on its expertise in tackling local authority housing problems in Wales.

Higher Education

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to receive a delegation from the Association of Polytechnic Teachers in Wales to discuss the funding of local authority higher education in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I have no plans to receive a delegation from the Association of Polytechnic Teachers in Wales. However, officials of the Department met representatives of the association on 13 June to discuss this subject and the future of the Wales Advisory Body for Local Authority Higher Education. I have seen a note of that meeting.

ENVIRONMENT

Asbestos (Faslane)

46. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he has made for removing asbestos from the construction site at Faslane.

Sir George Young: Subject to consultations with the Health and Safety Executive and Dumbarton district council, it is planned to decontaminate the site without removing the asbestos from it.

Defective Housing

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the average length of time he estimates home owners who qualify for assistance under the Housing Defects Act have to wait before they are offered reinstatement or repurchase under the terms of the Act;

(2) what is the maximum length of time he expects home owners who qualify for assistance under the Housing Defects Act should have to wait before they are offered reinstatement or repurchase under the terms of the Act.

Mr. Gow: The Act requires that an applicant should be notified as soon as is reasonably practicable whether he is eligible for assistance and then, separately, as to the form of assistance to which he is entitled. How long this takes will depend on the circumstances of each case and cannot be prescribed; but an authority must not delay unreasonably in reaching decisions. Information about the average length of time being taken is not available at present.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many home owners who qualify for assistance under the Housing Defects Act have applied for and been awarded a grant for reinstatement under the terms of the Act;

(2) how many home owners who qualify for assistance under the Housing Defects Act have applied for and been offered repurchase under the terms of the Act.

Mr. Gow: I regret that this information is not available at present.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many home owners are estimated to qualify for assistance under the terms of the Housing Defects Act.

Mr. Gow: In 1983 local authorities estimated that in Great Britain some 16,500 prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings of the types designated by my right hon. Friend had been sold by the public sector and were in private ownership. The number of eligible home owners was therefore estimated to be of this order. More recent information suggests that the total number in private ownership may be somewhat higher.

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to adjudicate upon the bids made by those local authorities with responsibilities for large numbers of dwellings of types designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984 for additional housing investment programme allocation.

Mr. Gow: My Department is considering the bids which have been made by local authorities for additional HIP allocations under the arrangements set out in DOE circular 9/85. Decisions will be made as quickly as possible.

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assistance he is contemplating for those local authorities that have in their housing stock substantial numbers of dwellings of types designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Gow: In recognition of the problems faced by authorities with substantial numbers of defective prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings in their housing stock a new indicator has been included in the generalised needs index, used in the housing investment programme allocation process.

The Department will continue to take into account, in annual HIP allocations, the need for expenditure on dwellings of this type. Moreover, the Building Research Establishment has published reports which will help authorites to appraise and deal with these problems.

Lifts (Emergency Telephones)

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he will take to ensure that lifts in buildings contain emergency telephones which can be used by people wearing hearing aids; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to make a general requirement of this kind. However, the licences for the running of branch communications systems granted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 3 August 1984 oblige the many organisations which have lifts in their buildings to which the public have access to take reasonable steps as soon as they can to ensure that any telephone installed in such a lift is capable of being inductively coupled to hearing aids. This obligation is also being imposed on organisations who are operating their telecommunications networks under individual licences.

Cornish Unit Dwellings

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many agencies are engaged in seeking techniques for the reinstatement of Cornish unit type dwellings; and if he will list these;

(2) what progress is being made towards developing a technique for the reinstatement of Cornish unit type homes under the Housing Defects Act 1984; and when he expects people in ownership of this type of dwelling and who qualify for assistance will be able to be offered reinstatement.

Mr. Gow: In my answer of 7 May to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), at column 299-300, I explained that the National House Building Council had approved arrangements for the warranty scheme for repairs to prefabricated reinforced concrete houses designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

PRC Homes Ltd., a subsidiary of the National House-Building Council, will very shortly be inviting designers and builders to submit proposals for the reinstatement of Cornish unit and other types of PRC house. I understand that a number of methods of repair of Cornish unit houses are now being prepared for submission to PRC Homes Ltd. and I hope that the first repairs to Cornish unit houses under the scheme will be under way before long.

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Cornish unit homes now in private ownership qualify for assistance under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Gow: In 1983 local authorities estimated that in Great Britain some 4,500 prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings of the Cornish unit type had been sold by the public sector and were in private ownership.

The number qualifying for assistance under the Housing Defects Act is likely to be of this order.

Palace of Westminster (PSA Expenditure)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the Property Services Agency's expenditure on the Palace of Westminister in 1984-85, 1983-84, 1982-83 and 1981-82.

Sir George Young: Records of expenditure are not maintained for individual buildings on the parliamentary estate. The gross expenditure for each of the years in question for the estate as a whole was:

1984-85	9,607,000
1983-84	9,285,000
1982-83	9,130,000
1981-82	6,076,000

Housing (Multiple Occupation)

Mr. Ernie Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to remove the requirement for a management order to be made before the Housing (Management of Houses in Multiple Occupation) Regulations 1962 may be applied to houses in multiple occupation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: No. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State sees no reason at present to apply the 1962 regulations to houses in multiple occupation which are managed satisfactorily. My right hon. Friend wishes to see the outcome of the Department's research on houses in multiple occupation before considering whether any further measures are necessary.

Football Grounds (Safety)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the Football Grounds Improvement Trust since 29 May about the condition of the Heysel stadium in Brussels and the implications for crowd safety and the control of violence at football grounds in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Macfarlane: The trust is represented on my working group on the financing of safety improvements at football grounds. The group met for the first time on 23 May 1985 and again on 19 June 1985. Our considerations encompass safety needs at football grounds, in the light of the various recent events.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further plans the Minister with responsibility for sport has to meet the Football Association and the Football League to discuss football violence.

Mr. Macfarlane: My informal and formal contacts with the football authorities, to take forward the package of measures to combat football spectator violence, are frequent. We meet formally in the working group which I chair, which is due to meet next on 11 July.

Glanford and Scunthorpe

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assistance his Department has rendered to the Glanford and Scunthorpe parliamentary constituency since June 1983 in the form of derelict land grants, urban aid grants, and other similar resources available to his Department giving the sums of money concerned in each case, the organisations aided and the effect of those grants and the creation of employment.

Sir George Young: The figures are as follows:

Organisation receiving grant	Urban programme		European regional development fund
	Capital	Revenue	Derelict land grant	Quota section	Non quota section	Industrial Development Act section 13
	£	£	£	£	£	£
(i) Public sector

Derelict land grant	†1	1
ERDF quota	2	12
Non. quota	—	8
IDA Section 13	—	3

†Initial offer of grant subject to detailed examination of proposals and tenders.
*This scheme lies partly in Glanford and partly in Scunthorpe.

The majority of these grants are related to the provision of sites suitable for development rather than to any development. It is therefore impossible to say with any accuracy what employment will be created as a result of the investment.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of tax and rating reliefs obtained by companies which have set up on the three enterprise zones in Glanford and Scunthorpe to date; and what estimate he has made of future costs to the Exchequer when the zones have been fully occupied.

Sir George Young: The only enterprise zone measure for which the cost to the Exchequer can be stated precisely is the exemption from rates. The cost of this to date in Glanford borough has been £65,505 and in Scunthorpe borough £284,916. No estimate has been made at this stage of the cost of this measure when the zones are fully occupied.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will describe the incentives available to companies setting up on the three enterprise zones in the constituency of Glanford and Scunthorpe; and what assessment he has made of the impact of those zones upon the creation of employment.

Sir George Young: The following incentives are provided specifically in enterprise zones.

1. Exemption from rates on industrial and commercial property.
2. Exemption from development land tax (now abolished)
3. 100 per cent. allowances for corporation and income tax purposes for capital expenditure on industrial and commercial buildings.
4. Employers are exempt from industrial training levies and from the requirement to supply information to industrial training boards.
5. A greatly simplified planning regime, developments that conform with the published scheme for each zone will not require individual planning permission.
6. These controls remaining in force will be administered more speedily.
7. Applications from firms in enterprise zones for certain customs facilities will be processed as a matter of priority and certain criteria relaxed.
8. Government requests for statistical information will be reduced.

Other incentives are also available within these enterprise zones.

Both Scunthorpe and Glanford enterprise zones are located within the scunthorpe travel-to-work area and therefore benefit from development area status. There are two forms of incentives. Regional development grants may be made in respect of capital expenditure on providing certain new assets (plant, machinery, buildings or works) under a qualifying project or in respect of the number of new jobs created; and regional selective assistance which has two main forms: project grant: these grants are based on the capital expenditure costs of the project and on the number of jobs created or maintained. All sectors of industry and commerce, both manufacturing and service, are eligible to receive project grants, and training grants, which are based on the training costs associated with manufacturing and service industry projects.

The current employment figures in these enterprise zones are: Fellexborough 94, Scunthorpe 404.

Private Rented Accommodation (Right-to-Buy)

Mr. Ernie Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to confer upon private sector tenants the right to purchase their rented accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: No.

Civil Defence (Water Authorities)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from water authorities on their progress towards drawing up civil defence plans; and if he will publish them in the Official Report.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his reply, 28 June 1985, c. 514]: Water authorities report good progress towards drawing up civil defence plans, and most of them expect to complete this task by the end of this year or shortly afterwards. I do not intend to publish these reports.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Maintenance

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has advised local education authorities as to a recommended minimum consultation period with parents where cessation of maintenance of a school is proposed as a result of the decision in R v Brent London Borough Council ex parte Gunning and others; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: No. The guidance already issued to local education authorities in circulars 2/80 and 2/81 and administrative memorandum 4/84 makes it clear that my right hon. Friend expects that there should have been adequate consultation with all those likely to be materially affected, in particular parents and teachers, in the 12 months prior to the publication of proposals under sections 12 to 15 of the Education Act 1980. The adequacy of prior consultations is a material factor in my right hon. Friend's decision on such proposals.

Disabled Access Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what study his Department has made of the disabled access survey of Leeds university, a copy of which has been sent to him; if there is any action he will be taking or recommending to other universities arising from the survey's findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Department has only recently received a copy of this survey and has not yet had the opportunity to study it. Guidance on the provision of access for disabled people to educational buildings is available in the Department's Design Note 18 (second edition 1984).

Deaf Teachers

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information has been or will be sought by his Department in respect of the ability of deaf teachers to teach before publication of the replacement circular for circular 11/78; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Comments were invited in September 1984 from a wide range of interested organisations, including teachers' associations, local authority associations, teacher training institutions, organisations representing the deaf and partially hearing and other voluntary bodies, on the draft of a replacement for ciruclar 11/78. The responses received, including representations made about the guidance in the draft on the implications of defective hearing for teaching or teacher training, are currently under consideration. My right hon. Friend will consider the need for further consultation in the light of the responses. Decisions on the employment of individual teachers with hearing impairments, and on the admission to initial teacher training of students with such impairments, will continue to rest with the employing bodies and the training institutions respectively.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received concerning the proposed merit and distinction awards for the new General Certificate of Secondary Education examination; and, of those, how many approved of the proposals.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has received over 360 responses to the consultation paper on GCSE distinction and merit certificates issued last December. About one-third of those replying express support for the proposals, in some cases with qualifications.

Music Teaching

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when Her Majesty's Inspectorate's discussion document on the teaching of music in schools is to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: Her Majesty's Inspectorate's "Music from 5 to 16" is published today, in the "Curriculum Matters" series. It sets out for comment aims and objectives for music teaching and discusses the content and method of music education and the assessment of pupils' progress.

"Music from 5 to 16" bases its analysis on the proposition, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I endorse, that all pupils in our schools can derive fulfilment and enjoyment from the study and practice of music: while fostering the development of those pupils who display particular musical talent, music education should also provide first-hand musical experiences which will challenge and absorb pupils across the whole range of musical ability, and will give them all the opportunity to show what they know, understand and can do.

My right hon. Friend and I welcome the publication of Her Majesty's Inspectorate's paper and commend it for consideration by all of those concerned with music education. We believe that they will find it of value both in improving standards within the wide range of musical activities which already exists in our schools and in extending that range still further.

University Students

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the percentage of the population in Scotland attending universities in the United Kingdom in each of the last 20 years;

(2) what is the percentage of the population in England attending universities in the United Kingdom in each of the last 20 years;

(3) what is the percentage of the population in Wales attending universities in the United Kingdom in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 24 June, c. 313]: The percentages of the population in Scotland, in England and in Wales attending universities full-time in the United Kingdom in the last 12 years were:

	Scotland	England	Wales
1983	0·67	0·44	0·46
1982	0·68	0·45	0·47

	Scotland	England	Wales
1981	0·69	0·46	0·49
1980	0·68	0·45	0·49
1979	0·66	0·44	0·47
1978	0·67	0·43	0·46
1977	0·66	0·42	0·45
1976	0·65	0·40	0·43
1975	0·63	0·39	0·42
1974	0·62	0·38	0·41
1973	0·58	0·37	0·40
1972	0·55	0·38	0·39

Figures for earlier years are not available.

Youth Training

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the participation rate for 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21-year-olds in education and training in each of the years since 1975; and what information he has as to how these figures compare with the rates for the United Kingdom's principal economic competitors.

Sir Keith Joseph [pursuant to his reply, 24 June 1985, c. 313]: Full data for the United Kingdom prior to 1979 are not available. The preparation of participation rates for both education and training require considerable estimation and have not been produced for all years since then. The figures readily available covering both full-time and part-time participation are as follows:

Participation in education† and training‡—United Kingdom*

Percentages

Age	1979	1981	1983
16	86	84	87
17	61	60	61
18	46	42	43
19‖	32	32	30
20‖	26	25	25
21 to 24	20	18	19

* Ages 16 to 18 include estimates for part-time private sector education and training, but exclude full-time private further education estimated as 4 per cent. at 16 and 2 per cent. at 16 to 18. Ages 19 and over exclude private sector education.

† Includes evening students, discounted for overlap with other types of study.

‡ Including apprenticeships, YOPs in 1979 and 1981, and in 1983, YTS.

‖ The split between 19 and 20-year-olds is partly estimated.

A limited amount of comparable information is available for 1979 and 1981 for a few countries, as follows:

*Participation in education and training

‡ Includes private sector higher education.

‖ Including compulsory part-time education for the youngest leavers; three years in Germany, one year in Netherlands.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Non-proliferation Treaty

45. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the approach Her Majesty's Government will be adopting to the third review conference of the treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear and weapons.

Mr. Rifkind: Our position towards this important conference was fully set out in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) during the Adjournment debate on this subject on 6 June, at columns 547-48.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received expressing concern for the future of the non-proliferation treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) gave to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 26 June, at columns 416-17.

European Council (Documents)

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends to place in the Library the documents entitled "Draft European Council Conclusions: Decision making and Draft Agreement on Political Co-operation" with annexes; and why he has not previously done so.

Mr. Rifkind: The conclusions of the European Council, together with the United Kingdom's suggestions for an agreement on political co-operation, an action programme for completion of the Common Market and on decision-taking are being placed in the Library in connection with the statement on the European Council by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. It would not have been normal practice to make these documents public while they were still being discussed in confidence with other member states.

Diplomatic Service

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken since 22 November 1984 to increase resources for and reduce pressure on the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. Renton: The arrangement described in Cmnd. 9367 by which overseas price movements are fully taken into account in the public expenditure survey as well as during the year has been finalised. Arrangements are now in place to enable sales of property overseas to be used for the rationalisation of the overseas estate. Beyond that we cannot anticipate the result of the public expenditure survey, which will, as usual, be made known in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's annual Autumn Statement.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of recent cuts in resources allocated to the Diplomatic Service, it remains the Government's intention to maintain a global foreign policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Adjustments to Foreign and Commonwealth Office programmes for 1985-86 led to a marginal reduction in geographical coverage with the closure of 10 small overseas posts. We are satisfied, however, that this has not significantly impaired our ability to pursue an active worldwide foreign policy.

Chile

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs with which political parties in Chile his Department has made recent contact; and what were the reasons for such contacts.

Mr. Renton: We maintain contact with a broad range of democratic opinion in Chile to inform ourselves of developments in that country and to indicate our interest in a return to normal political life. Recent visitors have included Sr. Rene Abeliuk of the Social Democratic party and Sr. Genaro Arriagada of the Christian Democratic party. We hope that Sr. Fernando Ochagavia of the National party will be able to visit this country in July.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will list all official delegations or Government-sponsored individuals or parties from Chile who have visited the United Kingdom since January 1983, stating in each case the purpose of the visit;

(2) if he will list all occasions since January 1983 when United Kingdom Government or military officials have visited Chile, stating in each case the purpose of the visit.

Mr. Renton: The information is not readily available. I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many meetings there have been with representatives of the Chilean armed forces in each year since 1979.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom has had normal diplomatic relations with Chile since 1980. Meetings with Chilean officials and representatives of the Chilean armed forces are consistent with this policy.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the purpose of the visit of generals of the Chilean armed forces to Britain.

Mr. Renton: As I told the hon. Member on 11 June, at column 415, visits such as that of members of the Chilean National Academy of Political and Strategic Studies, which took place last week, are part of the normal pattern of our relations with Chile.

Government Overseas Services

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to maintain and expand Government services abroad to assist British exporters in the promotion of both visible and invisible exports.

Mr. Rifkind: The promotion and protection of Britain's economic and commercial interests overseas, in coordination with the Department of Trade and Industry and other Departments with an interest in international trade, remains a major objective of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Over a third of Diplomatic Service and senior locally-engaged manpower overseas (excluding clerical and secretarial support staff) is devoted to this task, a proportion which has remained steady despite the reduction in Diplomatic Service manpower overall.

In view of the continuing need to control public expenditure, I cannot promise that more money will be available for Government services abroad for exporters. But the search will continue for improvements in efficiency and for the most cost-effective deployment of resources. Where it becomes necessary to look for further sensible economies, the quality of service will be paramount.

South Africa

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what study has been made of the effect of disinvestment in South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: We pay close attention to this question. We do not believe that disinvestment would achieve the changes we want to see in South Africa. On the contrary, we believe that trade and investment links are an important means of encouraging change.

Middle East (Peace Initiative)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, pursuant to the answer from the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) on 24 June, Official Report, column 317, he will now list, by name, date and specific venue, the occasions known to Her Majesty's Government when official Palestine Liberation Organisation spokesmen had stressed Yasir Arafat's support for King Hussein's peace initiative; and whether he will indicate which of those occasions also involved explicit acceptance of United Nations Security Council resolutions 242 and 338.

Mr. Rifkind: Mr. Arafat's commitment to the Amman agreement of 11 February is not in doubt. It was reinforced when a PLO spokesman said in Amman on 31 May that Mr. Arafat had expressed of King Hussein in his talks with President Reagan. Public acceptance by the PLO of United Nations security resolutions 242 and 338 would be another important step.

"great appreciation and full satisfaction with the Nationalist stand"

NATIONAL FINANCE

Economic Expansion

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now make it his policy to expand the economy in anticipation of a United States recession.

Mr. Peter Rees: There is no reason to expect a recession in the United States this year or next. As the 1985 Budget statement makes clear, the medium term financial strategy is as firm a guarantee against inadequate money demand in the United Kingdom as it is against excessive money demand. Both output and employment in the United Kingdom are currently growing at a substantial rate and the prospect is for further growth next year.

European Community Budget

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the amount of value added tax contribution payable as a percentage overall by the member states under the draft European Economic budget for 1986; what is the total amount budgeted for; what is the maximum amount which can be devoted to agricultural spending within the total; and how this figure is arrived at;

(2) what is the estimated gross contribution by the United Kingdom under the draft European Economic Community budget for 1986; and how much of this represents value added tax and how much other resources.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The 1986 preliminary draft European Community budget is not yet available.

Government Borrowing

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1955 the interest paid on central Government borrowing as a percentage of gross domestic product; and if he will include the amount represented by overfunding.

Mr. Peter Rees: The figures are readily available from published sources and can also be obtained from the Central Statistical Office databank, accessible through the House of Commons Library. The debt interest figures do include, by definition, interest payments on any overfunding. It is not possible to relate any precise part of the total to overfunding.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has yet decided whether it is necessary to deal with the question of losses for capital gains tax purposes referred to by the Chief Secretary in the House on 8 May, Official Report, 8 May, column 819.

Mr. Lawson: At present, gains on gilt edged securities and qualifying corporate bonds are exempt from capital gains tax if the securities are held for more than 12 months. Following a review of this treatment in the light of the introduction of the accrued income scheme, and as a further measure of simplification, it is now proposed to exempt these securities entirely from capital gains tax.

This exemption will apply to disposals of gilts and qualifying corporate bonds on or after 2 July 1986 and, to avoid further complication, amendments to the Finance Bill indexation provisions will be proposed so that they have no application to these securities.

As a result, taxpayers will no longer need to keep records or include these securities on their tax returns for capital gains tax purposes. At the same time, it will remove the possibility that the CGT indexation provisions could be deliberately used to establish short-term capital gains tax losses on these instruments, where counter-balancing gains would not normally arise because holders would delay realising gains until 12 months after purchase.

The Inland Revenue is today issuing a press release giving further information about these proposals and of the necessary consequential legislative changes. The changes will be introduced at Report stage of the Finance Bill.

Exchange Rates and Oil Price Assumptions

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the assumptions used by Her Majesty's Government for the exchange rate and oil price in their forecast of oil revenues in the Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 27 June 1985, c. 493]: North sea revenues depend on a range of factors such as oil production and company expenditures as well as oil prices and the exchange rate. The FSBR (pages 8-9) noted that the medium-term projections of oil revenues were based on the assumptions of falls in oil production and in real oil prices, and no major change in the sterling exchange rate index from year to year.

Taxation and Rates

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish estimates of (a) value added tax, (b) domestic rates, and (c) other indirect taxes, paid by those on (i) 75 per cent. (ii) 100 per cent. and (iii) 150 per cent. of average earnings in 1985-86 and each of the previous seven years; and if he will state the level of average earnings in each year.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 June 1985, c. 513]: Estimates based on the 1983 family expenditure survey and for four household types are in the table.

Notes:

1. Average earnings are taken to be the average gross weekly earnings of all full-time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. The levels of average earnings in each year are given below. The figures for 1985-86 is illustrative and assumes growth of 7 per cent. over the provisional 1984-85 outturn.

	£ per week		£ per week
1978-79	92·90	1982-83	157·50

1981-82	146·00	1985-86	†198·20

* provisional.
† assumption.

2. The married couple with both working is assumed to have joint earnings of the various multiples of average earnings. In calculating disposable income it is assumed that the joint earnings are split between husband and wife in the ratio 60:40.

3. The estimates are based on the illustrative assumption that 10 per cent. of disposable income is saved. They are derived from the 1983 family expenditure survey, but have been adjusted to reflect the effects of average changes in spending patterns over the eight year period.

4. The category "other indirect taxes" covers central Government taxes only, but includes the indirect effects of taxes levied on businesses.

DEFENCE

Base Closure

2. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are taken by his Department when considering the closure of bases owned by them, to phase such closures over a period of time to enable those directly and indirectly dependent on his Department for employment to find alternative work.

Mr. Lee: We seek to give the earliest possible warning of establishment closures to all concerned, including hon. Members, and to minimise any redundancies that may be necessary. When a decision on closure has been taken, we seek to phase the rundown consistent with meeting defence requirements and in consultation with the trade unions. Staff are transferred to other jobs in Government service where this is possible, and management is encouraged to assist those who are redundant in seeking alternative employment. We also seek to ensure that staff, contractors and others are informed as soon as detailed plans affecting their interests are drawn up.

Disarmament Talks

15. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the statistical information in regard to the nuclear balance as set out in annex A Defence Estimates 1985 vol. 1 has been verified and numerically agreed with both the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Soviet Union; and what are the reasons for the discrepancies between annex A and the statistics submitted by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for consideration by the current Geneva talks.

Mr. Stanley: The statistical information referred to is consistent with NATO assessments available at the time that the Statement on the Defence Estimates was being prepared. If the hon. Member has any particular statistical discrepancies in mind, I will be glad to examine them.

Trident Submarines

16. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the efficiency of the communication systems proposed to be used between the United Kingdom and Trident submarines.

Mr. Butler: Yes.

Falkland Islands

17. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any further plans to make an official visit to the Falklands.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

Experimental Aircraft Project

18. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning progress with the experimental aircraft project.

Mr. Butler: The experimental aircraft programme is a technology demonstrator programme that will provide practical experience in the integration of the wide range of new technologies required for any new, sophisticated combat aircraft. The design and construction of the aircraft is well advanced and on schedule for a first flight in mid-1986. I am pleased to report, therefore, that excellent progress is being maintained.

Merchant Fleet

19. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in view of the decline in the size of the British merchant fleet, he has reviewed, since the Falklands war, the arrangements for ships taken up from trade.

Mr. Stanley: We have been reviewing the likely future availability of merchant shipping required for defence purposes and that review is continuing.

Trident

20. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the development of the Trident programme.

27. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the Trident programme.

Mr. Butler: The programme for replacing Polaris with Trident continues to proceed satisfactorily, on the lines indicated in my answer to the hon. Members for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 26 March 1985 at column 179. Since then, one specific development has been the successful move of the prototype pressurised water propulsion reactor, known as PWR2, from Barrow to Dounreay, to undergo development tests and trials. The PWR2 will be used to power both the Trident submarines and the next generation of nuclear powered hunter-killer submarines.

Royal Dockyards

21. Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he hopes to make his decision on the future management structure of the royal dockyards following the consultation period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Depending on the outcome of current consultation, my right hon. Friend would hope to be able to make an announcement before Parliament rises for the summer recess.

RAF Maritime Craft Operations

22. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Defence what criterion he will apply when considering tenders for management services of Royal Air Force marine craft operations.

Mr. Lee: The normal criterion will apply. We will accept the cheapest tender from a company with the requisite financial and technical resources to do the job.

European Fighter Aircraft

23. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning his recent discussions on the European fighter aircraft.

31. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the European fighter aircraft.

32. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now make a statement on the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the discussions on the proposed European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Butler: The further industrial studies commissioned by Ministers of the five participating countries at their meeting in London on 18 June are proceeding. Industry has been asked to submit its proposals by mid-July and Ministers will review the position shortly thereafter. We will continue to do all we can to reach an agreement acceptable to all parties and which would enable project definition to be launched on a five nation, collaborative basis; to be acceptable to the United Kingdom the aircraft would have to have adequate performance and the interests of British industry properly safeguarded.

Middle East (Exercises)

24. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any plans for major exercises in the middle east.

42. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has for out-of-area exercises.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot at present add to what my right hon. Friend said on 12 June, at column 909, about next year's planned strategic mobility exercise. Its location has yet to be finalised.

Nuclear Weapons (Europe)

25. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Defence what current research he is undertaking with a view to installing new nuclear weapons in Europe.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) on 15 May 1985 (Vol. 79, column 151).

Chemical Weapons

26. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the current provision in the defence budget for protective equipment and counter measures against attack by chemical weapons.

Mr. Stanley: We give high priority to defensive measures against chemical attack and the level of provision currently planned would allow for a substantial amount of new protective equipment to be procured.

Burtonwood Base

28. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Defence what Burtonwood base, near Warrington, is used for; and what is transported to and from Burtonwood through the port of Liverpool.

Mr. Lee: RAF Burtonwood is a storage facility made available to the United States army. There is in addition a small training facility used by the British army on the site. Stores being taken from or to RAF Burtonwood may pass through a number of points of entry. It is not our practice to discuss details.

Defence Equipment

29. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence what have been the ratios of reciprocal sales and purchases of defence equipment between the United Kingdom and the United States of America through the so-called two way street over the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Butler: For the last five years for which figures are available the approximate ratios are:

	Ratio
1979-80	1·5 : 1
1980-81	2·0 : 1
1981-82	2·0 : 1
1982-83	1·9 : 1
1983-84	*2·1 : 1

* Provisional.

Destroyers and Frigates

30. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the present rate of ordering of destroyers and frigates.

Mr. Lee: Yes.

Defence Industries (Leicester)

33. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are currently employed in the defence industries in Leicester.

Mr. Lee: Estimates of the number of jobs in United Kingdom industry sustained, directly or indirectly, by defence expenditure are derived from generalised statistical information. It is not possible to break these estimates down into the numbers employed in a particular area.

Tornado F2

34. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of Defence if he will make a statement concerning the introduction of Tornado F2.

Mr. Butler: The Tornado F2 entered Royal Air Force service with the formation of the operational conversion unit at RAF Coningsby on 1 May 1985.

Strategic Defence Initiative

35. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any contracts have yet been signed by British companies in connection with the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Butler: Whilst individual United Kingdom companies may have entered into negotiation with the United States on matters relating to the strategic defence initiative, I am not aware of the award of any contracts.

36. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to discuss the strategic defence initiative with Vice President George Bush whilst he is in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heseltine: There are no plans for me to have detailed discussion with Vice President Bush during his visit to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has plans to meet the United States Secretary for Defence in the near future to discuss the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Heseltine: I have no plans as yet for a further meeting with the United States Defence Secretary in the near future, but my officials are in continuous contact with his on a range of subjects.

Helicopters (Cambridgeshire)

37. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence what complaints he has received about the use of military helicopters in the Cambridgeshire area.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend has received one letter on this subject, from the hon. Member, which is being attended to.

Trident Base (Coulport)

38. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met representatives of Dumbarton district council to discuss local aspects of the proposed Trident base at Coulport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has not met representatives of the council, but officials of the MOD and of the PSA last did so on 24 June.

RAF Caerwent

39. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will next visit RAF Caerwent.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has no plans to do so.

Cruise Missiles

40. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the installation of cruise missiles at Greenham Common and Molesworth.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) earlier today.

HMS Fearless and Intrepid (Replacements)

41. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will announce his decision about the replacements for the assault ships HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid.

Mr. Lee: We expect to take a decision on future amphibious capability in the middle of next year.

Low-flying Aircraft, Nottingham

43. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what increases there have been in the number of low-flying aircraft passing over the constituency of Bassetlaw, North Nottingham, since 1979.

Mr. Lee: I regret that we do not keep records of the number of low-flying military aircraft passing over individual constituencies.

3 Commando Brigade

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the role of 3 Commando Brigade.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985 Vol. I (Cmnd. 9430–I), paragraph 430, in which the role within NATO of 3 Commando Brigade Royal Marines is set out. The brigade is also, of course, available for national tasks.

Staff and Executive Responsibility Budgets

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the planned extended coverage of staff and executive responsibility budgets.

Mr. Butler: Staff responsibility budgets, which were first introduced in the financial year 1984-85, now cover all United Kingdom-based civilians. The range of expenditure which figures in these budgetary arrangements has been extended to include travel and subsistence costs. In addition, staff responsibility budgets for service personnel in the support field were introduced on a trial basis at the beginning of this financial year, 1985-86. Initially they will cover some 60,000 personnel but the intention is to extend this coverage in the future. Executive responsibility budgets were introduced on 1 April 1985 following a two-year period of trials and pilot schemes. The implementation programme is spread over three years and covers some 300 units and establishments in the support field in the United Kingdom. The activities involved include supply, repair, medical services, the individual training of service personnel, and research and development. This form of budgetary system embraces all expenditure attributable to the units concerned.

RAF Maintenance and Support

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the economies that have been achieved in Royal Air Force maintenance and support.

Mr. Lee: A wide range of measures are being taken to effect economies in RAF maintenance and support. The level of contracts opened to competition has increased significantly and engineering practices, provisioning procedures and parameter values, manpower employment and the use of transport resources, land and other facilities continue to be the subject of criticial review. Specific measures have included the commercial management of the physical aspects of the defence accommodation stores depot task at RAF Quedgeley and of the air forms and publication warehousing at Woolwich, and of engineering and supply support for basic flying training and communications aircraft at RAF Linton-on-Ouse, Shawbury and Northolt and for all university air squadrons and air experience flights; increased industrial support for the major servicing of several aircraft types and a reduction in the capacity of major repair units, including lower civilian manpower balanced by enhanced productivity; the use of civilian driving schools for the training of tradesmen drivers and most accommodation cleaning conducted under contract; together with the introduction and expansion of computer support in all areas, including air passage reservations.

5th Airborne Brigade

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the role of the 5th Airborne Brigade.

Mr. Lee: 5th Airborne Brigade has a general war role in home defence; it is also the army brigade earmarked for operations outside the NATO area.

Army Pay, Manning and Records Office

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence, if will make a statement concerning the role and staffing of the Army's pay, manning and records office.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 25 April, at column 519. by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement. The evaluation of the proposals to relocate the army manning, record and pay offices has taken slightly longer than I had anticipated, but I hope to be able to make an announcement before the House rises for the summer recess. This will make clear the future staffing of these offices. Their role will not be affected by the proposed reorganisation.

Chile

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names and ranks of all those officers from Chile currently visiting the United Kingdom, the names of all people and organisations whom they met during their visit and the purpose of the visit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Twelve students and staff of the Chilean National Academy of Political and Strategic Studies, led by its director, Brigadier General Navarrete, visited the United Kingdom from 23 to 29 June. The group met officials from the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and visited the Royal College of Defence Studies; two service headquarters; the Institute of Latin American Studies; the Civil Service College and the International Institute of Strategic Studies.

Whale and Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence what whale or turtle products have been purchased by his Department during the past five years.

Mr. Lee: None.

China

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent meetings with his ministerial counterparts in the Chinese Government.

Mr. Heseltine: I have had no such meetings. The recent ministerial discussions which took place during the Chinese Premier's visit to the United Kingdom did not involve Defence Ministers.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Gibraltar

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the managing director of Gibraltar Shiprepair Ltd. about the possibility that the £28 million granted to the Gibraltar Government to commercialise the dockyard in Gibraltar over a period of three years could be used up by the end of 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: I have received no representations from the managing director of Gibraltar Shiprepair Ltd.

The capital aid grant of a maximum of £28 million was intended to finance physical development and civil engineering of the former naval dockyard, to meet certain "start-up" expenses and cover any operating cash deficit during the first two years of commercial operations, which began on 1 January 1985. It therefore had always been our expectation that disbursement of our capital aid grant would be completed by the end of 1986, or shortly after.

UNESCO

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the number of member countries of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation whose national commissions or their equivalent are chaired by a member of the Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: According to information provided by UNESCO in March 1985 there were 93 national commissions chaired by a member of the Government concerned.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future status of the United Kingdom National Commission for the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organisation in the light of Her Majesty's Government's conditional decision to withdraw from that body.

Mr. Raison: The United Kingdom National Commission for UNESCO would continue in its present form until at least the end of 1985, when our decision on Britain's possible continued membership of the organisation will have been made.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning Her Majesty's Government's conditional decision to withdraw from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Raison: At the end of June, 134 written representations had been received since the announcement of our conditional decision to withdraw from UNESCO.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of the proposed withdrawal of the United Kingdom from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation for North-South relations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: Some developing countries have shown concern that our giving notice indicates a loss of interest by Western countries in the United Nations system and multilateral co-operation. I hope that the energy we and other Western countries have shown in seeking improvement in UNESCO will disabuse them of this belief.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Vietnamese Refugees

44. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what representations he has received with regard to the impact of the new board and lodging regulations upon Vietnamese refugees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received several representations from, among others, the British Refugee Council about the possible impact of the new board and lodging regulations on Vietnamese refugees. The main concern was that young Vietnamese refugees living with their parents in board and lodging accommodation would be forced to leave because of the time limits on payment as a boarder. The draft regulations laid before the House on 26 June exempt such young people from the time limits and payments will be made on an ex-gratia basis until the regulations come into force. If there are any other problems affecting Vietnamese refugees we will look into them.

Heroin

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department had consultations with the Anti-Heroin Campaign or with Mr. Pete Townshend's anti-heroin group before launching the current campaign against heroin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Yes. My right hon. Friend and I and officials had discussions with Mr. Townshend on several occasions. Officials have met and have been in correspondence with Ms. Lynne Franks who has acted in co-ordinating the anti-heroin campaign. Their approaches differ from ours, which is based principally on recent research findings, but we welcome their interest in tackling drug misuse.

Health Services (North-West)

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the total numbers employed by the National Health Service in the north-west region in 1978-79 and 1983-84.

Mr. John Patten: The available figures are shown in the table. They relate to 30 September in each of the financial years requested; annual average staff numbers are not available.

Total NHS Directly Employed Staff in North Western Region

	†Whole-time equivalents 1978*	‡1983
Total NHS staff including agency Nursing and Midwifery staff and locum Medical and Dental staff)	66,800	76,100

Notes:—
* Excludes hospital practitioners, part-time medical officers (clerical assistants), general medical practitioners participating in hospital staff funds, occasional sessional staff in the community health services and overseas doctors in the NHS fellowship scheme.
† Figures are not adjusted for the reduction in nurses' working hours (from 40 to 37½ hours per week) in 1980
‡ Figures for bank nurses were collected on a separate manual return in September 1983

Death Grant

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer of 17 June, Official Report, column 40, he will give details of the numbers of staff employed in administration of death grant, the cost of accommodation, the cost of postage and the cost of post office encashment charges in those years on which the calculation of costs was based in 1982 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The costs of administering individual benefits are derived by apportioning total administrative costs in accordance with sample surveys of the amount of staff time devoted to particular activities. The results inevitably have a high degree of statistical uncertainty for the smaller benefits, and it would not be meaningful to break them down into individual categories of expenditure. As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 17 June, at column 40, the overall costs of salaries, accommodation and encashment charges increased over the period, due in part to changes in the basis on which these costs are attributed to Departments; at the same time, later sample surveys suggested a greater proportion of staff time spent on death grant work. Neither of the figures referred to in my previous reply were intended to give more than a broad indication of costs.

Benefits

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people, referred to an insurance officer for either refusing suitable employment or neglecting to avail themselves of opportunities for work, have had benefit denied in consequence in: 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of people in Great Britain disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit for these reasons are as follows. Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

	Refusal of suitable employment	Neglect to avail	Total
1979	7,112	662	7,774
1980	8,227	736	8,963
1981	4,194	585	4,779
1982	2,248	434	2,682
1983	1,450	433	1,883

Although supplementary benefit may be withheld if a claimant refuses suitable employment and if the situation is still vacant or open to application, such cases are rare, and no statistics are available about the number of cases in which this happens. However, a voluntary unemployment deduction is applied to a supplementary allowance when a person has been disqualified, or would be disqualified, for receiving unemployment benefit under section 20(1) of the Social Security Act. This may be for other reasons than refusal of employment, for example because of leaving work voluntarily without just cause, but the available statistics do not permit the precise reason for deductions to be identified. The following table therefore shows all cases with such deductions.

United Kingdom	Reductions of Supplementary Benefit*
1979	370,000
1980	270,000
1981	190,000
1982	190,000
1983	300,000

* The supplementary benefit figures have been estimated from information in the Annual Statistical Enquiry, on the assumption that deductions apply for, on average, four weeks.

Medicines (Sugar Content)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will investigate the sugar content of paediatric medicines and its impact on the aetiology of dental caries;

(2) if he will take steps to ensure that a range of sugar-free liquid medicines are made available in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: We have received expert advice on a number of occasions that long-term use by children of medicines containing sugar can cause serious dental decay. A warning to this effect has been included in the "Prescribing for Children" section of the British National Formulary and prescribers are encouraged to use sugar-free alternatives wherever possible.

In discussions with manufacturers, licensing authority staff stress the desirability of minimising or removing the sugar content of medicines, especially paediatric ones. Sugar in solution is, however, a non-toxic and effective base and preservative for liquid medicine and it can be difficult to reformulate satisfactorily using alternatives which do not present other problems.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many households, in receipt of supplementary benefits, and at what cost, were assisted within the housing benefit scheme with (i) their heating costs, (ii) their lighting costs, (iii) their hot water costs: (iv) their cooking costs in each of the years for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has of the number of young people still at school who are able to obtain supplementary benefit from his Department.

Mr. Whitney: Supplementary benefit may be paid to young people who are remaining after the age of 16 in full-time, non-advanced education if they fall into one of four special groups. These include, broadly, those who have a child of their own, or are severely handicapped and would be unlikely to obtain work within 12 months, or are orphans not being cared for by anyone else, or are estranged from their parents. Separate statistics are not kept of the number of young people who fall into these categories.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why no funds under the central initiative to provide services for drug misusers have yet been allocated to the St. Helens and Knowsley area health authority.

Mr. John Patten: One application under the central initiative has been received from St. Helens and Knowsley health authority for a health education officer. This is under consideration.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list each grant made under the central initiative for services for drug misusers.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is in the table.

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much central funding to support initiatives concerned with drug abuse was applied for by the Bradford district health authority; and when these funds will be made available.

Mr. John Patten: Bradford health authority has applied for funds under the central funding initiative for a toxicological screening service, a senior health education officer and a nurse to undertake a liaison/education and research role. The total value of the bids is £162,500. The toxicological screening service will be approved shortly; the other proposals are under consideration.

Hospital Telephones

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he will take to ensure that all telephones, including patients' trolley telephones, in National Health Service hospitals can be used by people who wear hearing aids.

Mr. Newton: We agree that this is a desirable objective, and we are considering appropriate ways of bringing the matter to the attention of health authorities.

Heating Addition

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what number and percentage of supplementary benefit claimants are receiving central heating addition nationally and in the west midlands;

(2) what number and percentage of supplementary benefit claimants are receiving the higher central heating addition nationally and in the west midlands;

(3) what number and percentage of supplementary benefit claimants are receiving heating additions on the grounds of (a) ill health and (b) old age nationally and in the west midlands.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what number and percentage of supplementary benefit claimants in Lancashire are receiving central heating addition;

(2) what number and percentage of supplementary benefit claimants are receiving the higher central heating addition;

(3) what number and percentage of supplementary benefit claimants in Lancashire are receiving heating addition on grounds of (a) ill health and (b) old age.

Mr. Whitney: Available information on claimants receiving these heating additions in December 1983 is as follows. It is not possible to identify the number of claimants receiving a heating addition on grounds of ill health. Information on heating additions is not available separately for claimants in the west midlands or Lancashire.

	Number (thousands)	Percentage of all Supplementary Benefit claimants
Central heating additions
Total	1,010	23
Higher rate only	562	13
Age related heating additions
Pensioners	258	6

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry 1983.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has consulted the fuel boards on the implications of abolishing central heating addition.

Mr. Newton: The proposal announced by my right hon. Friend on 18 June was that existing recipients of central heating additions would continue to receive them whilst they remained on supplementary benefit (and entitled to the additions under the present rules), but that no further awards would be made with effect from 5 August. We have not consulted the fuel industries about this proposal.

Board and Lodging Regulations

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many young people, who would currently fit into the category covered by the board and lodging regulations as being between 19 and 26 years old and fit, were in receipt of board and lodging allowance in the Hereford DHSS area on 1 April in each of the years 1979 to 1985 inclusive.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Board and Lodging Establishments

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of landlords of ordinary board and lodgings establishments, excluding registered hostels, which were providing accommodation for supplementary benefit claimants at the time when he laid the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 before the House; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, for England, Wales and Scotland, and for each Department of Health and Social Security region.

Mr. Whitney: Information in the form requested is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NHS Staff (Pay)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which categories of employees in the National Health Service are paid for periods when they are away from their place of work, but on call and who subsequently get summoned for emergency work; and which categories are not so paid.

Mr. John Patten: All staff in the categories in list A are eligible for such pay; certain staff in list B are also eligible; staff in the categories in list C are ineligible:

A
Ancillary Ambulance
Maintenance
Professions Supplementary to Medicine
Speech therapists Technicians

B
Administrative and Clerical
Community doctors
Hospital medical and dental
Nursing and midwifery Works

C
Clinical psychologists
Community dentists
Dental ancillaries
Hospital chaplains
Opticians
Pharmacists
Scientists

Pharmacists (Pay)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received advocating the establishment of a system whereby pharmacists who are on call outside normal working hours are remunerated for the times they respond to a request for their services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have received representations in different forms, but the subject is a matter for negotiation on the appropriate Whitley council. Under present agreements, any hospital pharmacist working more than his conditioned hours is entitled to take time off in lieu; one who is required to work on Sundays and public holidays is entitled to a special duty payment.

Students (Income Support)

Mrs Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if it is the Government's intention that students should be barred from basic income support.

Mr. Newton: We have made clear in the Green Paper, "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9517), our belief that students should not be supported simultaneously by the grants system and by social security, and our preference is for a situation in which they are maintained through grants, their own vacation earnings and support from their families. How it might be possible to move towards such a situation will be considered further in the light of consultations on the Government's forthcoming consultative paper on student support.

Hospital Hygiene

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of times that wards for operating theatres of National Health Service hospitals have had to be closed through lack of hygiene over the last 10 years; and if he will list the hospitals and health authorities concerned.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect centrally the information requested.

Social Security Review

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, when he publishes the details, he will make it his policy to clarify the likely gainers and losers in the proposals outlined in the review of social security according to whether the claimants are (a) above or below retirement age and (b) are or are not responsible for children.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) at columns 92-3 on 18 June.

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if under 16-year-old mothers will be entitled to the new maternity grant proposed in the Green Paper on the reform of social security.

Mr. Newton: We shall consider the entitlement of mothers under age 16 as we develop our proposals for the social fund. Our guiding principle will remain our desire to concentrate help on low income families.

Limited List Prescribing

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what efforts he is making to improve his Department's relationship with the pharmaceutical industry following the limited list controversy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We continue to seek to achieve a fair balance in the public interest between the needs of the National Health Service as a customer and the pharmaceutical industry as a contributor to the national economy and major employer. We have acknowledged the industry's desire for a period of stability in its relations with the Government. We expect shortly to begin discussions on the extension or renegotiation of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. We are currently consulting the industry on the permanent arrangements for obtaining advice to review and keep up to date the selected list of medicines for the National Health Service.

Mentally Ill and Handicapped People

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to reply to the report of the Social Services Committee on care of the adult mentally ill and handicapped in the community.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) on 25 June at column 378.

Blind and Visually Handicapped People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many mobility officers for the blind were employed by local authorities during each of the last five years for which figures are available; how many blind or visually handicapped people were trained or supported in each of these years; and what is the ratio of mobility officers to blind or visually handicapped people registered with each local authority;

(2) what information he has as to how many local authorities provide community-based rehabilitation services, including courses, for blind and visually handicapped people; and what percentage of visually handicapped people aged over 65 years use these services;

(3) if, following the publication of the Royal National Institute for the Blind of the survey on local authority rehabilitation services to visually handicapped people, he will take steps to ensure (a) greater consistency of high level provision of services to visually handicapped people between and within local authorities, (b) a higher visual handicap specialist to client ratio, (c) a greater range of community-based rehabilitation services and aids to visually handicapped people, including specialist counselling where appropriate, (d) an improved registration and assessment process for newly visually handicapped people and (e) a higher input on the needs of, and services for, visually handicapped people in social work training courses.

Mr. Newton: The Department does not collect information on the numbers of specialist staff employed by local authorities in the visual handicap field, nor on the content of rehabilitation provision made locally for various client groups.

However, in order to increase our knowledge of provision made for visual handicap, the Department has undertaken a fact-finding exercise to gather information from health, social services and voluntary agencies in several areas around the country. Many of the problems highlighted in the valuable report published by the RNIB also emerged from this exercise. We are currently looking at the findings of the exercise, and will certainly take the RNIB report into account in considering how improvements in service provision for visually handicapped people could best be encouraged.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice and information his Department gives local authorities about ensuring that elderly, visually handicapped people are given the same access to services as younger people.

Mr. Newton: Local authorities are well aware of their statutory powers and responsibilities with regard to younger as well as older people with visual handicap. It is for them to decide how best to arrange provision locally to cater for the various needs of different age groups.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many local authorities automatically register blind or visually handicapped people of whom they are aware without their specific consent; and what guidance his Department provides about obtaining consent prior to registration.

Mr. Newton: Information about registration practice in individual local authorities is not collected centrally. Guidance contained in local authority circular 17/74 clearly states that assistance provided under section 29 of the National Assistance Act 1948 as extended by section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 is not dependent upon registration; that a person's wish not to be formally registered must be respected; and that such assistance should not be withheld on that account.

Drug Rehabilitation Centres

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many drug drop-in centres and drug rehabilitation centres have been opened in the last six years.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not held centrally. However, rehabilitation centres known to the Department are listed in "Drug Misuse: Prevalence and Service Provision", (DHSS, June 1985), a copy of which is in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive (Contracts)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list dates of appointment and name consultants to whom contracts have been allocated by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive, who has advised me that this information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list contractors to whom the Northern Ireland Housing Executive contracts have been allocated, and the date and value of contracts awarded in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive, who has advised me that information in the form requested is not readily available and could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many contractors have been suspended from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive approved list in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive, who has advised me that the information is as follows:

Year	Number
1982-83	88
1983-84	197
1984-85	727

Larne-Belfast T9 Route

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the dates and times during which road traffic surveys were carried out on the Larne-Belfast road route T9 in each of the last five years for which records are available; and what were the results in each case.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information for the four census points on the Larne-Belfast road, T9 is as follows:

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the involvement of his Department and of the European Economic Community in the future upgrading of the Larne-Belfast T9 route.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department has no proposal to upgrade the Larne-Belfast T9 route.

Children in Care

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many complaints received from children in care or their parents in each of the health and social services board areas in each of the last five years have been substantiated;

(2) how many complaints have been received from children in care or their parents in each of the health and social services board areas in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The term "children in care" includes not only children accommodated in residential homes, but also those boarded out with foster parents and those living with a parent, relative or guardian under "home on trial" arrangements and so on. Information about complaints made by children or their parents in relation to all these forms of care is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The available information is as follows. Two complaints are still under investigation.

Children's Homes (Staff)

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of staff have been dismissed from children's homes in each of the health and social service board areas during the last five years as a result of complaints being received.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information in respect of statutory and voluntary children's homes is as follows:

Board area	Number
Eastern	12
Northern	1
Southern	3
Western	nil

Ballyhalbert and Cloughey (Housing)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many houses the Northern Ireland Housing Executive have at Ballyhalbert and Cloughey; what is the present waiting list at each of these locations; and what is the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's future building programme at each of these locations.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive, who has advised me that the information is as follows:

	Number of houses	*Waiting list
Ballyhalbert	27	5
Cloughey	49	5

* As at 20 June 1985.

The future building programme, which has regard to the priority and urgent need categories within total waiting lists, as well as to factors such as annual re-lets is:

Ballyhalbert —5 dwellings planned to start in December 1985
Cloughey —Nil.

Energy Act 1983

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he plans to bring into force the Energy Act 1983 in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: Legislation is being prepared for Northern Ireland based broadly on the Energy Act 1983, and it is hoped that a proposal will be published later in the financial year. Meanwhile, the Northern Ireland Electricity Service will continue to treat the provisions of the Energy Act as a code of practice in dealing with proposals from small private generators of electricity.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total number of unemployed in Northern Ireland, by electoral ward, local government district and parliamentary constituency.

Dr. Boyson: The numbers of unemployed claimants in each local government district and parliamentary constituency in Northern Ireland at 9 May 1985 are as follows. As there are over 500 electoral wards in Northern Ireland, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman giving May unemployment figures for each electoral ward.

Social Security Offices

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing which local government wards are served by each of Northern Ireland's social security offices.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 28 March, at column 135.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the number of people claiming supplementary benefit, indicating the number of allowances and pensions at each of Northern Ireland's social security offices.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information as at 7 May 1985 is as follows:

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate by convenient geographic units the number of students or trainees in Northern Ireland who are receiving supplementary benefit.

Mr. Chris Patten: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate, in total and by each social security office, the number of claimants receiving supplementary allowances in Northern Ireland who are not required to be available for work.

Youth Training

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate, by convenient geographical unit, the number of young people currently engaged with the youth training programme in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: On 31 May 1985 there were 7,236 young people in full-time training schemes under the youth training programme, as follows.

Jobmarket area	Number
Antrim	140
Armagh	123
Ballymena	349

In addition, approximately 3,700 young employees were receiving training under youth traing programme workschemes and 450 under the skill training scheme. A geographical breakdown of these figures is not available.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Prospects (Merseyside)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the current employment prospects on Merseyside.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are committed to maintaing their economic policies, which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing while encouraging enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. That is the only way to generate lasting jobs on Merseyside and elsewhere. In the meantime, we are spending over £2 billion this year on a range of employment and training measures, two of which — the youth training scheme and the community programme — are to be considerably expanded. Over 20,000 people on Merseyside are currently benefiting from these measures.

Jobcentres (Older Applicants)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will consult the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission with a view to his instructing jobcentre staffs that they are not to discourage applicants on the ground that they are too old at 45 or 50 years for consideration.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Jobcentre staff are instructed to question the need for apparently unnecessary age limits imposed by employers and to encourage them to consider a wider range of applicants, pointing to the experience and reliability of many older jobseekers. Where, however, employers insist on upper age limits the jobcentre staff will advise older jobseekers not to apply.

Trade Unions

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce further legislation on trade unions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The first three steps in our programme of legislative reform have gone a considerable way towards promoting a more responsible approach towards industrial relations and making trade unions more accountable to their members. More remains to be done, particularly in guaranteeing proper and effective rights to union members.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest available figures for the total number of people (a) available for employment and (b) actually in work.

Mr. Alan Clark: In December 1984, the latest date for which information is available, the working population of the United Kingdom, that is the employed labour force plus the unemployed, was estimated as 27,404,000; of which the employed labour force (employees in employment plus the self-employed plus Her Majesty's forces) was estimated to be 24,185,000.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed (a) adults and (b) young people aged between 16 and 21 years there were for evey job vacancy registered in the county of Hampshire and Portsmouth at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. Table 1 shows the most recent available unemployment statistics for adults and young people. Figures are not available for the 16 to 21-year age group. Table 2 shows the number of unfilled vacancies at the Portsmouth jobcentre and careers office, and those at the jobcentres and careers offices which closely correspond to the county of Hampshire. Figures for vacancies at jobcentres and careers offices cannot be added together because some vacancies are notified to both offices at jobcentres are normally open to persons of all ages. Because of the differences in the bases of the unemployment and vacancy figures, accurate ratios of unemployed to vacancies cannot be calculated.

Glanford and Scunthorpe

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will describe the nature of assistance rendered by his Department to Glanford and Scunthorpe parliamentary constituency since June 1983 in the form of employment, training and other schemes, describing the nature of the schemes, the numbers of people affected in each case and the sums of money allocated under each scheme and in total.

Mr. Peter Morrison: All our employment and training measures are available to people living in the Glanford and Scunthorpe parliamentary constituency. Some 25,000 of them are estimated to have been helped since June 1983, although because of the various bases on which local information is collated an unknown proportion will live in areas outside my hon. Friend's constituency. The relevant measures are:

The youth training scheme, which improves young people's preparation for work by providing 16-year-old school leavers and unemployed 17-year-old school leavers with a year's integrated training and work experience.

The community programme, which provides a year's employment on projects of benefit to local communities, for the long-term unemployed.

Community industry, which provides temporary job opportunities for personally and socially disadvantaged young people.

The adult training programme which embraces a range of training provisions in which resources are increasingly concentrated on intensive courses tailored directly to employers' needs and on updating existing skills rather than on more speculative training with uncertain job prospects.

The young workers scheme, which encourages employers to provide more full-time permanent jobs for young people under 18 at wages which realistically reflect their youth and inexperience.

The job splitting scheme, which supports with a grant employers who split a full-time job or alternatively combine regular overtime hours into a part-time job and take on an unemployed person into the part-time vacancy; or who creates two new part-time jobs for those leaving the youth training scheme or certain other Government schemes.

The job release scheme enables older workers to retire early with an allowance until they qualify for the state pension, provided that their employer replaces them with an unemployed person.

The part-time job release scheme introduced in October 1983 now provides a further option, for people to part-retire early by giving up part of their job in return for an allowance—and a part-time worker to be taken on.

The enterprise allowance scheme, which helps unemployed people start their own business by providing an allowance of £40 per week for a year. The allowance helps compensate for the loss of income when unemployment or supplementary benefit payments cease.

The Department also ran the temporary short-time working compensation scheme until March 1984. This encouraged employers to adopt short-time working as an alternative to redundancies.

Total numbers covered and the money allocated under each scheme are as follows:

	1983-84 outturn £ million	Numbers	1984-85 provisional outturn £ million	Numbers	1985-86 estimated £ million	Forecast numbers
Youth training scheme	380·5	370,000	773·4	390,000	781	384,000

Temporary short-time working compensation scheme	27·2	16,000	6·1	6,000
TOTAL	1,419·3	929,326	1,992·6	944,240	2,146·6	1,070,400

Notes:

1. The outturn figures are programme expenditure only (ie they do not include administration).

2. The numbers for community industry are for only young people (that is excluding supervisors).
3. The numbers for the job release schemes are coverage at year end.
4. The numbers for community programme and community industry are entrants.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the numbers on youth training schemes in Portsmouth at the latest available date; and if he will give a breakdown of the ethnic origin of those accepted on such schemes in the last year.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There were 1,022 young people in training on the youth training scheme in the Portsmouth local authority district at the end of May. Information on entrants to the scheme in the area in 1984-85 is given in the table:

Ethnic origin	Entrants
White-European	1,679
African-West Indian	1
Asian	6
Others	11
TOTAL	1,697

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in Portsmouth and Hampshire are currently in receipt of enterprise allowance; and how many people in each area have completed one year on the scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: 1,112 people are currently in receipt of the enterprise allowance in the Hampshire and Isle of Wight area and 535 people have completed one year on the scheme. No separate figures are available for the Portsmouth area.

Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are employed by Her Majesty's Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate; and how many were so employed in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures are:

Number of staff in Her Majesty's Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate

1 June	Inspectors	Support Staff
1980	47	24
1981	46	22
1982	45	20
1983	41	12
1985	42	12

The drop in the number of support staff between 1982 and 1983 was caused by the transfer of staff from the inspectorate's sampling teams to the Health and Safety Executive's research and laboratory services division. They now form part of the field scientific support units which provide scientific and analytical services to the Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate and other parts of the executive.

WALES

Labour Statistics

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the level of female unemployment in Brecon in each year since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Following is the information in respect of the former Brecon travel to work area.

			Percentage
May 1979	Registrant based	96	3·0
May 1980		108	3·4
May 1981		146	4·5
May 1982		175	5·4
May 1983	Claimant based	171	5·3
May 1984		202	6·3

The travel to work area boundaries were changed in November 1984. The figure for the new Brecon travel to work area in May 1985 was:

240 6·8

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the latest unemployment figures for north Wales; and what were the comparative figures for July 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: For the purpose of this answer north Wales is defined as the counties for Clwyd and Gwynedd. On 9 May 1985 there were 38,003 unemployed claimants in north Wales. There is no directly comparable figure for July 1979 at which date the registrant based figure was 19,396.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Choir Schools

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what subsidy his Department pays to choir schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Department pays no subsidy to choir schools, though, as some of these schools participate in the assisted place scheme or the analogous scheme for music and ballet schools, parents of some pupils receive means-tested assistance with fees from the Department. There is no present prospect of either extending these schemes or introducing any separate scheme for choir schools as such.

Diabetics

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what research his Department is supporting into alternatives to insulin injections for diabetics.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. I understand that the MRC is currently supporting three research projects concerned with alternatives to insulin injections for diabetics:

i. A prospective study, with other co-funding bodies, comparing diet, sulphonamide drugs and insulin as possible alternatives for the control of glucose in maturity-onset diabetes.

ii. The development of a slow infusion pump as an alternative to injection as a means of administering insulin.

iii. Research on pancreatic islet transplantation as a method for treating diabetes.

The council is also supporting other research on diabetes which might prove relevant to developments in treatment.

It is likely that research work on and relevant to the treatment of diabetes is being conducted in universities and medical schools using funds allocated for teaching and research through the University Grants Committee, but details of such work are not collected centrally.

Part-time Education

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to increase the level of participation in part-time education by full-time employees.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government fully recognise the need for the country's work force to be kept up to date with technological, social, legal and market developments and consider that the education service has a major part to play in meeting this need. They are seeking to persuade those employers who do not already do so to invest in updating their employees through the adult training campaign and to ensure that there is adequate provision in the higher and further education service to meet the increased demands to be made upon it by means of the PICKUP (professional, industrial and commercial updating) programme.

In addition, the Government have indicated to the Open University the priority they attach to science and technology and to the provision of updating courses for those employed in industry and commerce and the professions.

Educational Establishments (Visits)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the educational establishments that he has visited in an official capacity in (a) Portsmouth and (b) Hampshire.

Sir Keith Joseph: Since June 1984 I have visited three educational establishments in Hampshire, none of which was in Portsmouth. The establishments visited were:

Guillemount junior school, Farnborough;
John Hanson comprehensive school, Andover;
Cricklade college, Andover.

Women Teachers

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many women teachers there were working (a) in primary education and (b) in secondary education in each year of the period 1979 to 1985; and in what disciplines.

Mr. Dunn: Information on numbers of teachers by sex is available for full-time teachers for the years 1979 to 1984:

† Some teachers will be counted under more than one subject. Also, a particular subject is counted each time it occurs in a teacher's qualifications. Some teachers may therefore be counted more than once for a particular subject. Some 300,000 subjects were reported in men teachers' qualifications and 240,000 in women teachers' qualifications: between 2 and 3 per teacher.

Not all teachers with a qualification in a subject are teaching it. Corresponding information is not available for primary schools.

Dental Students

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many dental students there were in England and Wales in each of the last 20 years per head of population; and how many student grants there were to dental students per head of population for the same dates;

(2) what was the percentage of the population in Scotland, England and Wales attending degree courses for dentistry in universities in the United Kingdom for each of the last 20 years, giving separate figures for Scotland, England and Wales; and what were the corresponding figures in each case for the percentages qualifying.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his replies 20 and 24 June 1985, c. 181 and 313]: Information in the form required is not readily available.

The available information is given in the tables.

ENERGY

Electricity Supply Industry

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has received a copy of the results of the opinion survey commissioned by the Electricity Supply Trades Union Council about public attitudes towards the services supplied by the electricity supply industry and whether or not it should be privatised; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I have received a copy of the survey to which the right hon. Member refers. There are no present plans to privatise the electricity supply industry.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Internal Drainage Boards

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the internal drainage boards, with dates, established since 1979.

Mrs. Fenner: The Swavesey internal drainage board in the Anglian water authority area is the only board established since 1979. This board was constituted on 1 April 1981.

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many internal drainage boards there are.

Mrs. Fenner: There are 255 internal drainage boards in England and Wales.

Paper Manufacture

Mr. Hancock asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to implement the findings of his Department's report of July 1984, which investigated the possibility of using straw pulp for the manufacturing of paper; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department's straw utilisation group provides a forum where industrialists, farmers, research workers, officials and other interested parties can review regularly progress on the whole range of research undertaken in this field and can disseminate their findings to the industries concerned. Commercial development and assessment of commercial viability are matters for the relevant industrial sector to decide. The group met recently to review progress on the projects covered in its 1984 report and noted that studies funded by the Government has identified a number of paper mills and factories potentially capable of utilising straw and, provided appropriate industry support was forthcoming, that a full feasibility study on a particular manufacturing method would be appropriate.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Speakers' Corner (Abuse)

Mr. Winnick asked the Attorney-General, if he has yet received the report of the Director of Public Prosecutions on whether charges should be made against those who have disrupted speakers at Speakers' Corner, Hyde Park, with obscene or racial abuse.

The Attorney-General: I recently discussed with senior staff of the Director of Public Prosecutions a report submitted to him by the Metropolitan police concerning certain incidents in the vicinity of Speakers' Corner, Hyde Park. We concluded that the traditional gatherings at Speakers' Corner fall outside the ambit of the Public Meetings Act 1908. Although the evidence relating to the incidents which are the subject of that report was insufficient to justify proceedings under any other enactment, the evidence relating to any future incident would have to be considered on its own merits.

I have invited the Home Secretary to consider the problems raised by this case in the conext of his review of public order law.

ENVIRONMENT

Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Houses

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Building Research Establishment has developed a successful means of halting the deterioration of mild steel load-bearing stanchions in Wates prefabricated reinforced concrete homes.

Mr. Gow: There are no mild steel load-bearing stanchions in such houses. There is a steel joint supporting the first floor but that is unlikely to deteriorate and there have been no reports of any problems. There is, however, mild steel reinforcement in the reinforced concrete components. Once corrosion in these prefabricated components has begun there is no known method of halting its progress. If there is no corrosion, the application of surface coatings to the concrete may slow down the processes leading to corrosion. Guidance on these coatings is given in Building Research Establishment Digest No. 265. A copy of this paper has been placed in the Library.

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department collects on the purposes to which money raised under section 142 of the Local Government Act 1972 is put by local authorities.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local authorities are not obliged to identify separately expenditure incurred under section 142 of the Local Government Act 1972. My Department does not therefore collect information in the form to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend section 142 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Widdicombe inquiry has been asked to report by the end of July on local authorities' discretionary spending on publicity and political campaigning. We shall wish to consider the inquiry's recommendations very carefully, both in relation to section 142 of the Local Government Act 1972 and generally. As we have made clear on previous occasions, we certainly do not preclude legislation in due course.

European Soccer Matches (Crowd Safety)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek information from all Football League clubs involved in matches in Europe last season with regard to arrangements made for crowd safety at those matches.

Mr. Macfarlane: I am in close consultation with the Football Association and Football League, of which these clubs are members on the safety needs of football grounds. I believe that the experience of matches abroad last season and in previous years is available to the governing bodies.

Housing (Multiple Occupation)

Mr. Ernie Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to apply provisions analogous to those applying to houses in multiple occupation through the Housing (Management of Houses in Multiple Occupation) Regulations 1962 in relation to mansion blocks and similar premises; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: We must see what conclusion the committee chaired by Mr. Edward Nugee, QC reaches as to the nature of the problems of management in privately owned blocks of flats and its recommendations on how best to proceed. The committee is expected to report later this year.

Chinese Archway, Manchester

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations his Department has received concerning the funding of the proposed construction of a Chinese archway in Manchester; what reply he has sent; if urban programme funding on the scale needed will now be approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A proposal for joint funding by Manchester city council and GMC using urban programme funds has been received from the city council. The GMC has yet to resolve whether to support that application, and despite repeated requests the city council has failed to submit its full inner area programme for urban programme funding in 1985-86. I am not in a position to reach a decision until the local authorities concerned resolve the outstanding matters and come forward with firm proposals.

Manchester Council for Voluntary Service

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what reply he is sending to the representations made to him on 18 June by the general secretary of the Manchester Council for Voluntary Service; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall send a copy of the reply to the right hon. Member.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much is being spent by the Property Services Agency on conservation of energy in their buildings during the current year; and how much is planned for future years.

Sir George Young: The agency has set aside £3 million in 1985-86 for energy conservation works on the civil estate. Expenditure in subsequent years will depend upon decisions in the annual public expenditure surveys.

Council House Sales

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking further to encourage the sale of council houses.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend and I keep the progress of council house sales under regular review. Sales are continuing at a rate in excess of 100,000 a year. I am considering whether further encouragement might be given to tenants of flats to exercise the right to buy.

Tower Blocks (Gas Facilities)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what communications he has sent to local authorities concerning installation of mains gas facilities for dwellings or other services in system-built tower blocks; and what information he has requested concerning such installations and their removal.

Mr. Gow: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave on 23 October 1984, at columns 553-57, to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on 10 May this year, at columns 526-27 and to the letters from my Department to local authorities of 26 October 1984 and 10 May 1985, copies of which were placed in the Library.

In the letter of 26 October 1984 authorities were reminded that mains gas should have been disconnected from all large panel system buildings over six storeys in height which had not been designed or strengthened to resist a standard static pressure of 5lb per square inch (psi). At the same time authorities were asked to complete a return of all their large panel buildings stating their height, the forces which they were capable of resisting and whether they had a piped gas supply. These returns are being analysed by the Building Research Establishment.

In the statement enclosed with the Department's letter of 10 May 1985 I again drew attention to the need for authorities to take urgent steps to prevent the use and storage of explosive materials in large panel system buildings of more than six storeys not designed or strengthened to resist a standard static pressure of 5 psi. I urged authorities to appraise the robustness and resistance to progressive collapse of their large panel buildings of six or fewer storeys, particularly where piped gas was installed or liquid petroleum gas was used.

Sellafield

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will update to calendar years 1983 and 1984 the information on discharges of radionuclides to sea from the Sellafield site given in National Radiological Protection Board paper R171; and what proportion of the plutonium contained in the discharges made to sea from the Sellafield site up to 31 December 1984 is estimated to have originated in the Magnox reactors of the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Tourist Board

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out in the Official Report the amount of funds allocated to the Scottish Tourist Board by his Department in each of the years from 1979 to 1985.

Mr John MacKay: The amounts allocated are as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	4·3
1980-81	5·2
1981-82	6·1
1982-83	7·6
1983-84	7·9
1984-85	8·5

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange to meet the chairman of the Scottish Tourist Board to discuss the proposals by the board for designating eight major tourist routes in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The board is already in consultation with the Scottish Development Department and other interested bodies about its proposals.

Long-term Unemployment

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the social consequences of long-term youth unemployment in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No specific assessment of the social consequences of long-term youth unemployment has been made in Scotland.

A study of the social and psychological effects of unemployment on disadvantaged young people was, however, undertaken on behalf of the Department of Employment by the social and applied psychology unit of Sheffield university. The study covered 11 urban areas in England. A summary of the first stage of the study appeared in the August 1984 issue of the Employment Gazette.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to reduce the level of long-term unemployment in Scotland and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The best means of improving prospects for all unemployed people in Scotland, as elsewhere in Great Britain, lies in the Government's economic strategy, re-emphasised in the Budget statement, of keeping inflation down, offering real incentive for enterprise and restoring competitiveness to industry.

The Government's full range of special employment and training measures continues to be available throughout Scotland for long-term unemployed people.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of long-term youth unemployment in Scotland at the latest available date; and what was the level in July 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed claimants in Scotland under the age of 25 years who had been unemployed for over a year was 42,382. It is difficult to make a comparison with July 1979 because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982 and the change to a ward based system for allocating claimants to localities. The number of registered unemployed under the age of 25 years who had been unemployed for over a year in jobcentre areas in Scotland in July 1979 was 10,294. This information is available in the Library.

New Towns (Housing)

Dr. M. S. Miller asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what, in respect of each of the Scottish new town development corporations in each of the years 1978-79 to 1984-85, inclusive, and 1985-86 to date, were (i) the number of persons on waiting lists for houses to let at 1 April and 1 October and (ii) the numbers of and sizes of corporation houses at 31 March (a) completed and first let, (b) vacated and re-let, (c) sold to sitting tenants, (d) sold with vacant possession and (e) sold on a shared equity basis;

(2) what, in respect of each of the Scottish new town development corporations in each of the years 1978-79 to 1984-85, inclusive, and 1985-86 to date, were (i) the categories of applicants whose waiting time for acceptance of application to allocation of a dwelling was greatest and the average waiting time for such categories and the categories of applicants whose waiting time was shortest and the average waiting time for such categories and (ii) the numbers of and sizes of private sector houses and flats in each of the said years to 31 March which were (a) completed and (b) sold on a basis which included any element of subsidy or financial assistance by the development corporation and the total amount of such subsidy or financial assistance.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Dining Facilities

Mr. Conway asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the organisations which have used the dining facilities of the House during the current Session to date.

Mr. Biffen: The banqueting rooms may be reserved by hon. Members for private functions from Mondays to Saturdays. It is not the refreshment department's practice to make public information which may be available to it on the nature of functions sponsored by hon. Members.

Mr. Conway asked the Lord Privy Seal how many meals were served in the current Session to date in the public dining rooms of the House; and what was the average cost and charge per meal.

Mr. Biffen: The total number of meals served in the banqueting rooms in the current Session to 27 June was 50,456 (including teas) and in the Harcourt Room and Strangers' Dining Room was 23,461. The menu and tariff structures in these different venues are too diverse for average costs and charges to be given on a meaningful basis.

Running Costs

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if, pursuant to his answer of 24 June, Official Report, column 320, to the hon. Member for Leicester, East regarding the costs of running the House of Commons, he will specify, for each year, the Votes concerned, the sum attributable to each and who is responsible for accounting for each Vote.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is as follows:

	1981-82 (Actual)	1982-83 (Actual)	1983-84 (Actual)	1984-85 (Voted)
(i) Parliament and Privy Council: House of Commons (Class XIII, Vote 2)	21,528	22,987	28,067	31,248
(ii) House of Commons: Administration (Class XIIIA, Vote 1)	13,830	15,094	15,481	17,433
(iii) Central Management of the Civil Service: Computers and Telecommunications (Her Majesty's Treasury) (Class XIII, Vote 13, Subhead B2)	283	263	442	807
(iv) Stationery and Printing Supplies to the Houses of Parliament, etc. (Class XIII, Vote 22*, Subhead A2)	6,172	6,687	6,855	8,800

* In 1981-82 Class XIII, Vote 25 and in 1982-83 Class XIII, Vote 23.
The Accounting Officers for these votes are as follows:
(i) and (ii) Mr. K. A. Bradshaw, CB (Clerk of the House of Commons).
(iii) Mr. A. M. Bailey, CB (Second Permanent Secretary (Public Services Sector) Her Majesty's Treasury).
(iv) Mr. W. J. Sharp, CB (Controller and Chief Executive: Her Majesty's Stationery Office).

PRIME MINISTER

North of England Regional Consortium (Report)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister whether she has considered the factual evidence produced by the North of England Regional Consortium and sent to her on the differences in the economic and social fortunes of regions in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Yes. The Government's policy of regional industrial incentives is designed to reduce regional disparities in employment opportunities on a stable long term basis.

European Community

Mr. Soames asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of developments at the Milan summit, she will make a statement on the future political and economic objectives of Her Majesty's Government in the European Economic Community.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement that I made to the House yesterday (Official Report, 2 July 1985, c. 185-199).

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Reports)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the reports of the Chief Inspector of Prisons on Holloway prison and Bullwood Hall youth custody centre will be published.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to be able to publish both these reports soon.

Diced Cap Bands

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to which organisations wear diced cap bands similar to those worn by the police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that five ambulance services and one fire brigade wear diced cap bands, but that these are of a different colour from those worn by the police.

Riot Damages Act 1886

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he has any plans to seek to repeal or amend the Riot Damages Act 1886; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will consider introducing measures to provide for interest to be payable on sums awarded in compensation to victims of riots; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The White Paper on the review of public order law, published on 16 May, proposes that claims under the Riot (Damages) Act 1886 should in future be subject to the test of the proposed new statutory offence of riot. My right hon. and learned Friend will consider whether any other changes are needed in the present statutory arrangements for compensation for victims of riot in the light of the comments received on the White Paper.

Public Disorder

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about repeated instances of disruption at Speakers' Corner, Hyde Park, and obscene and racial abuse; whether he has any information on the political affiliation of those involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the police have received a number of complaints from speakers at Speakers Corner that a group of people have disrupted meetings there by aggressive and offensive heckling. The police have sought to prevent meetings being disrupted, but two prosecutions which were brought were unsuccessful. The Commissioner has no reason to believe that the hecklers are a politically organised group. The police will continue to keep a watch on the situation, and will take appropriate action if criminal offences are committed or a breach of the peace appears likely. My right hon. and learned Friend will consider, in the light of conclusions recently reached on this matter by the Attorney-General, whether any changes in the law are required.

Terrorism (Preventive Security Operation)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has anything to add to his statement to the House of 25 June, Official Report, columns 774-75, regarding the preventive security operation being co-ordinated by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, whom I had asked to coordinate the inquiries being undertaken by a number of police forces in England, Wales and Scotland in connection with this matter, announced yesterday that the police were now satisfied that the slight possibility of bombs having been placed in certain towns no longer existed. The terms of the statement which he issued was as follows:

"Following the discovery of a bomb in the Ruebens Hotel, London, on 23rd June, the public was warned of "a slight possibility" of further bombs having been placed in certain towns. As a result of further developments the police are now satisfied that this particular threat has been removed. However, they cannot rule out the possibility of a random retaliatory attack and there is a need for continued vigilance by members of the public.

Police operations will now be reduced although members of the public may still experience some occasional inconvenience as the emphasis changes from large scale investigation and search to routine measures of prevention designed to forestall any future attack. The continued cooperation of the public is much appreciated."

A number of people have now been charged with serious criminal offences in connection with the events referred to in my earlier statement. It would therefore not be appropriate for me to give further details.

Sri Lanka Citizens (Entry Clearance)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many citizens of Sri Lanka have applied for entry clearance to enter the United Kingdom since the introduction of the requirement of such citizens to obtain entry clearance to enter the United Kingdom; how many entry clearance officers there are at the British embassy in Colombo; what assurances have been sought from the Sri Lankan authorities about safeguarding any Sri Lankan citizens who apply at the British embassy in Colombo for entry clearance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I have been asked to reply.

Since the introduction of the visa requirement 1,327 Sri Lankans have applied for visas at the British high commission in Colombo, up to and including 30 June. Sri Lankans will also have applied at other British posts overseas, but details of their number could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

There are five entry clearance officers at the British high commission, Colombo.

Our High Commissioner has sought and obtained assurances from the Sri Lankan authorities that immediate remedial action will be taken should any harassment of visa applicants occur.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Portaferry (Housing)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply of 13 June, Official Report, columns 547-8, how many of the 44 applicants on the waiting list for houses in Portaferry are presently residents of Portaferry.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the housing executive but I understand from the chairman that the figure is 31.

NHS Hospitals (Private Patients)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing average daily bed occupation, inpatient discharge and deaths, average duration of stay, outpatient attendances and day cases for private patients in National Health Service hospitals in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: During 1983 there were on average 26 private patients occupying beds in general hospitals daily. The other information requested is not collected separately in respect of private patients.

Youth Unemployment

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the level of long-term youth unemployment in the Province at the latest available date; and what were the equivalent figures in July 1979;

(2) what assessment he has made of the social consequences of long-term youth unemployment in the Province; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what plans Her Majesty's Government have for reducing youth unemployment in the Province; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: At 9 May 1985 there were 496 young persons aged under 18 in Northern Ireland who had been continuously unemployed for more than one year. A comparable claimant based figure is not available for July 1979 but 449 unemployed persons aged under 18 had been registered at Jobmarkets for more than one year at that date.

The Departments of Economic Development and Education have initiated a study, undertaken jointly by the Queen's University of Belfast and the policy planning and research unit of the Department of Finance and Personnel, of approximately 3,000 fifth form pupils from over 70 schools and colleges throughout Northern Ireland. Contact over three years will ascertain the educational and employment experiences of these young people and will provide social, psychological and attitudinal information on those unable to find work. The results cannot be available before 1987.

The Government's economic policies, which are designed to provide conditions under which industry and commerce can create sustainable jobs for young people, are supplemented by a number of initiatives. These include action for community employment (ACE) and enterprise Ulster, the enterprise allowance scheme and the young workers scheme. The main initiative directed at young people is the youth training programme (YTP), which has been created to ensure that there are constructive and worthwhile opportunities for young people and is designed to cater for the vocational education and training needs of all 16 and 17-year-olds. YTP has made a significant contribution towards reducing youth unemployment in Northern Ireland and I am confident that it will continue to do so. Since the programme began, more than half of the young people leaving full-time training schemes have immediately entered employment. The Government are keeping under review how best the programme might be improved in the light of developments in Great Britain following publication of the White Paper on education and training for young people.

Discrimination

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, pursuant to his answer of 13 June, Official Report, column 1012, he is now in a position to make a further statement about safeguards against discrimination in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: Data published today by the Department of Finance and Personnel illustrate a number of marked differences between the characteristics of Protestant and Roman Catholic communities in Northern Ireland, in such areas as educational background, employment and occupation and housing.

While such deeply rooted differences exist it will not be easy to secure early dramatic changes. Nevertheless, I believe it to be in the long term interests of the whole community that the Government should explore immediately the possibility of further action to promote equality of opportunity and protect against discrimination. I have already welcomed the wide-ranging review of anti-discrimination law which will be undertaken over the next 18 months by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights. The importance of this work is underlined by the data published today. I have now also asked officials to prepare urgently proposals for discussion later this year to make our approach to full equality of opportunity in employment more comprehensive, consistent and effective.

Terrorism (Anglo-Irish Co-operation)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what indications he has received from the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland as to the policy of himself and other members of the Northern Ireland bench in the event of implementation of measures of co-operation between Her Majesty's Government and the Republic of Ireland currently under discussion and including participation of judges from the Republic of Ireland in trials of terrorist-type offences in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has sought the advice of the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland on the practical implications for the judiciary of any proposal to enable judges from the Republic of Ireland to sit and participate in courts trying terrorist-type offences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 25 June 1985, c. 365]: Consultations between the Government and the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland are, and must remain, confidential.

Sons of William Annual Band Parade

Rev. William McCrea asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the costs of policing the Sons of William annual band parade in the years 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 27 June 1985, c. 450-51]: Precise details could be provided only at disproportionate cost. No information is available for 1984, but an estimate of the cost of policing the parade in 1985 shows it to have been in the region of £35,000.

Rev. William McCrea asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable as to how many police officers were on duty for the Sons of William annual band parade between the hours of 7 o'clock and 10 o'clock in Cookstown, County Tyrone, Northern Ireland, in 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 27 June 1985, c. 450-51]: The Chief Constable informs me regularly of law enforcement issues, including the conduct of parades and marches and the police resources involved.

TRANSPORT

Manchester International Airport

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether any extra scheduled international services for Manchester international airport are proposed for commencement in 1986.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Twenty seven applications for licences to serve international destinations from Manchester are now with the Civil Aviation Authority. It has been agreed that from April 1986 British Airways and SIA will be able to operate up to three services per week each from Manchester to Singapore. We also hope to begin negotiations soon with the US Government about the basis on which US carriers may operate services into Manchester.

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will identify those 33 international scheduled services now operating from Manchester to which he referred during the debate on airports policy on 17 June, Official Report, column 37.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The 33 destinations served from Manchester by international scheduled services are as follows:

City	City	City	City
Amsterdam	Dubrovnik	Milan	Paris
Athens	Dusseldorf	Montpellier	Pula
Bangkok	Frankfurt	Munich	Rome
Barcelona	Geneva	New York	Shannon
Bergen	Larnaca	Nice	Stavanger
Brussels	Madrid	Oslo	Sydney
Copenhagen	Malta	Palma	Tel Aviv
Cork	Melbourne	Paphos	Zurich
Dublin

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will identify those 14 international scheduled services from Manchester which have commenced in the current year to which he referred during the debate on airport policy on 17 June, Official Report, column 37.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Scheduled services, which are either to new destinations or by carriers new to the routes, have been introduced from Manchester to:

City	City	City	City
Bergen	Larnaca	Munich	Palma
Dusseldorf	(2nd carrier)	(2 services)	Paphos
(2nd carrier)	Malta	New York	Stavanger
Geneva	Montpelier	Oslo	Tel Aviv

Singapore Airlines (Manchester)

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made in implementing the agreement with the Government of Singapore on 3 May concerning flights between Manchester and Singapore; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Sir W. Clegg) on 26 June at column 427.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what precepting arrangements will be adopted in the event of a district council seceding from a public transport joint board either in whole or in part proposed after abolition of the metropolitan county councils to ensure a proper distribution of the financial burden relating to any functions which remain to be provided on a county-wide basis.

Mrs. Chalker: The Local Government Bill provides for the amendment of section 12 of the General Rates Act 1967 to include the new joint authorities, and in general precepts levied by the authorities will be subject to the requirements of that section. The detailed precepting arrangements which would apply in the event of secession by a district council would depend on the circumstances of the individual case. But the objective would be to ensure that the precept to be issued to each district council by the public transport joint board resulted in an appropriate share of the joint board's liabilities being charged to the district's ratepayers, taking into account the provisions of any secession order.

Airports (London)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will publish the outcome of the studies he has commissioned on the relocation of the sludge farm at Heathrow airport and on the viability of a rail link to Stansted airport.

Mr. Ridley: The study of the feasibility of releasing the Perry Oaks site to Heathrow airport has been commissioned by the British Airports Authority, in consultation with the Thames water authority, who own the site. British Rail are, in consultation with the owners and operators of the airports concerned, evaluating the options for providing rail services to Stansted and to Manchester airport. These studies are a matter for the authorities concerned. I will consider any investment proposals they wish to put forward as a result of these studies in accordance with the normal criteria, and will make my decisions known to Parliament.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the British Airports Authority to submit to his Department its investment strategy for the development of Stansted airport for evaluation; and if this strategy will be published and made available to Parliament.

Mr. Ridley: The strategy for the development of Stansted airport is set out in the White Paper on "Airports Policy" (Cmnd. 9542) and in the decision letter, which was made available to Parliament, approving the British Airports Authority's application to develop the airport. I expect the BAA in the normal way to submit to me soon, for my financial approval, its proposals for the construction of the first phase of the development in accordance with this strategy and with the conditions attached to the planning permission. I will inform Parliament of and when any such proposals are approved.

A17 (Leadenham)

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's most recent estimate of the number of vehicles in any 24-hour period passing through Leadenham along the A17 road.

Mrs. Chalker [pursuant to the reply, 2 July 1985, c. 89]: The estimated number of vehicles passing through Leadenham, along the A17, is currently 10,600.

This estimate is based on a traffic count taken in July 1983, and updated by the latest national road traffic forecasts of December 1984.

EMPLOYMENT

Sports Clubs

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment how much the Manpower Services Commission has spent on projects involving sports clubs in each of the last two years; what expenditure is planned in the current year and 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information about the amount of money spent on sports clubs under the community programme is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to increase the Manpower Services Commission ceiling fixed in 1982 of £15,000 for projects involving sports clubs.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand from the Manpower Services Commission that it is already reviewing its internal guidance about projects involving sports clubs. I have asked that my hon. Friend be informed of the results of the review.

Wages Councils

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received regarding the future of wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend and I have now received 755 responses to the consultative paper on the future of wages councils.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what were the levels of unemployment in each special development area in England and Wales at the latest available date; and what were the corresponding figures for July 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. As special development areas were abolished in November 1984, the latest figures relate to October 1984 and to the former travel-to-work areas and jobcentre areas which comprised special development areas at that time. It is difficult to make a comparison with July 1979 because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982 and the 1983 Budget provisions; but figures are given for registered unemployed in the same areas in July 1979 .

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of long-term youth unemployment in England and Wales at the latest available date; and what was the level in July 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available, the number of unemployed claimants under the age of 25 years who had been unemployed for over one year in England and Wales was 276,583 an 21,871 respectively. It is difficult to make a comparison with May 1979, because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982 and the change to a ward-based system for allocating claimants to localities. The number of registered unemployed under the age of 25 years who had been unemployed for over one year in jobcentre areas approximating to England and Wales in July 1979 was 42,984 and 3,887 respectively.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current level of long-term youth unemployment on Merseyside; and what was the level in July 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available, the number of unemployed claimants under the age of 25 years who had been unemployed for over one year in Merseyside was 22,099. It is difficult to make a comparison with July 1979, because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982 and the change to a ward-based system for allocating claimants to localities. The number of registered unemployed under the age of 25 years who had been unemployed for over one year in jobcentre areas approximating to Merseyside in July 1979 was 8,264.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons are unemployed in the Liverpool travel-to-work area at the latest available date; and what were the figures for July 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 9 May 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the Liverpool travel-to-work area was 104,986. It is difficult to make a comparison with July 1979, because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982, the 1983 Budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 or over, no longer need to sign on at unemployment benefit offices to receive benefit, and the changes to a ward-based system for allocating claimants to localities. The number of registered unemployed in the former Liverpool travel-to-work area in July 1979 was 61,522.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons were unemployed on Merseyside at the latest date; and what were the figures for July 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 9 May 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in Merseyside was 138,847. It is difficult to make a comparison with July 1979, because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982, the 1983 provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 or over, no longer need to sign on at unemployment benefit offices to receive benefit, and the change to a ward-based system for allocating claimants to localities. The number of registered unemployed in jobcentre areas approximating to Merseyside in July 1979 was 87,327.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the social consequences of long-term youth unemployment on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: A study of the social and psychological effects of unemployment on disadvantaged young people has been undertaken on my Department's behalf by the social and applied psychology unit of Sheffield university. The study covered 11 urban areas, including Merseyside. A summary of the first stages of the study appeared in the August 1984 issue of the Employment Gazette.

Apprenticeships

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will consider implementing a school leaver trainer programme involving apprenticeships in specific skills similar to that of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government have just approved plans for a major expansion of the youth training scheme. This will mean a longer period of training for 16-year-olds, a greater attention to training in specific, occupational skills, and the chance to gain a recognised vocational qualification, or credits towards one. The new scheme will draw on lessons from overseas, and will build on the achievements of the existing scheme. It will go a long way towards matching the training system in Germany.

Jobcentres

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide figures of the staffing levels in jobcentres yearly since 1979 (a) nationally and (b) in Portsmouth.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The figures requested are given in the table:

	Nationally	In Portsmouth
1979	11,396·5	Not available
1980	11,248	39
1981	10,392	36
1982	10,100	33
1983	9,779	29
1984	9,398	27·5
1985	9,126	27·5

Notes

1. Figures refer to permanent staff in post on 1 April each year.
2. The national figures include an element for area office staff supervising local office services. Separate national figures for jobcentres only are not immediately available before 1 April 1984 and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Wages

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any evidence of a correlation during the years 1979 to 1985 between the numbers of people employed in the wages inspectorate and the numbers of workers paid arrears after their employers were found to have been underpaying them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of inspectors influences the number of underpayments found, but the link is not necessarily causal and does not hold under all circumstances. For example, in 1969, when there were 146 inspectors in post, only 13,000 workers were found to have been underpaid whereas in 1984, when there were 115 inspectors in post, over 18,000 workers were found to have been underpaid. As 17 per cent. of the establishments visited in 1969 were found to have been underpaying one or more workers compared with 35 per cent. in 1984, it is clear that the general level of compliance is a very important factor.

The figures for the period to which the question relates were as follows:

	Wages Inspectors in post	Workers paid arrears and wages	Percentage of establishments visited underpaying one or more workers per cent.
1979	159	22,457	31·5
1980	155	28,373	35·1
1981	117½	24,117	41·3
1982	116	18,562	39·8
1983	116	18,494	37·4
1984	115	15,801	35·6
1985 (June)	120	*	*

* Not available

In interpreting the figures given above it is important to bear in mind that the Wages Inspectorate is influential in helping to secure the current generally high level of compliance. Only 6 per cent. of the workers whose pay was checked in the past three years were found to have been underpaid.

In addition to the general level of compliance, there are other factors which influence the relationship between the figures. These include:

(1) the tendency in recent years for more workers to be paid at or slightly above the minimum rate thereby leaving less margin for error;
(2) the increase in the number of businesses closing down and having no resources to meet claims for arrears of wages;
(3) the size of awards by wages councils;
(4) increased compliance resulting from the publicity given to wages councils matters during the past two or three years; and
(5) the extent to which individual workers ask the Inspectorate not to pursue payment of arrears.

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the future of information technology centres (a) in Portsmouth and (b) in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government are firmly committed to the information technology centre programme, which will have an important role to play in the new two-year youth training scheme to be introduced from 1 April 1986. An examination of the future role and overall strategy for information technology centres will be carried out in the next few months by the Manpower Services Commission in consultation with interested parties, including centre sponsors and managers, and will be completed by the early autumn. It will cover all information technology centres, including Portsmouth. The commission's examination will be carried out in parallel with an independent review of information technology centres being undertaken by management consultants.

Community Programme

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with progress in expanding the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We have announced that the community programme would be expanded by 100,000 places to 230,000 filled places by the end of May 1986, and set an interim target for December 1985 of 180,000 filled places. Latest available figures are that 162,707 places have now been approved.

Industrial Tribunals (Discrimination Claims)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many claims have been made to industrial tribunals alleging sex and race discrimination, respectively, during each year for which records are available; how many and what percentage of such claims have been withdrawn before hearing; of those heard, how many and what percentage have failed; and what remedies were awarded to successful claimants.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about the outcome of applications to industrial tribunals under the Race Relations Act 1976 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 has been published at regular intervals since 1977 in the Employment Gazette, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of (a) fatal, (b) major and (c) minor accidents on the youth training scheme from 30 September to 30 May, showing the average number of persons in training in each month during that period and the total number of entrants to the scheme in those three months.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 June 1985, c. 512]: Information is not available in the precise form requested. Accident figures for the youth training scheme are compiled on a quarterly basis. The following table therefore shows the number of accidents, the number of entrants and the average numbers in training for the two quarters, October-December 1984 and January-March 1985.

Period	Number of entrants	Average number in training	*Accidents
			Fatalities	Injuries
				Major†	Minor
1 October 1984 to 31 December 1984	105,436	309,918	—	55	515
1 January 1985 to 31 March 1985	47,800	282,521	‡1	41	468

* The Manpower Services Commission's accident figures for the youth training scheme are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the Commission's figures will include a number of accidents, in particular road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational establishments, which may not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.

† Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurances Regulations 1980.

‡ During the period 1 January to 31 March 1985, one further fatality involving a youngster on the youth training scheme was notified to the Manpower Services Commission. Investigations to determine the exact causes of the incident and whether it would be reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the youngster been employed are being carried out by the local enforcing authorities.

DEFENCE

Brecon Barracks

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date contract cleaning of Brecon barracks first commenced.

Mr. Lee: 19 September 1983.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the annual cost of cleaning Brecon barracks prior to cleaning being privately contracted.

Mr. Lee: The annual in-house costs of cleaning were substantially above those now being paid to the successful contractor. For reasons of commercial confidentially exact figures cannot be stated.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there have been any changes in standards for the cleaning of Brecon barracks following the decision to put this out to private tender.

Mr. Lee: The requirements specified at time of contract are being met.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the number of cleaners employed at Brecon barracks (a) currently and (b) immediately prior to the cleaning being put out to contract.

Mr. Lee: The contract is at a firm price for cleaning in accordance with a statement of requirements, and it is a matter for the contractor how many people he employs to this end. Before the work was put to contract seven part-time cleaners were employed by the Ministry of Defence on the work.

Trident Submarines

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has at any time ordered a review of the total number of Trident submarines planned for construction by Her Majesty's Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The decision to opt for a four boat Trident force was announced by the previous Secretary of State for Defence on 11 March 1982 at column 975. Four submarines are the minimum needed to sustain without fail at least one always on patrol.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has at any time ordered a review of the total quantity of nuclear warheads planned to be fitted to British Trident D5 submarine-launched ballistic missiles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the statement in paragraph 30 of "Defence Open Government" document 82/1.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the estimated annual percentage of the total Trident submarine budget that is expected to be spent with the private sector of British industry for the years ending April 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994 and 1995.

Mr. Butler: No such estimates are made. Contractors for the Trident programme have been and will continue to be selected on merit and there is no policy of preference to either public or private sector industry. Overall it is expected that 55 per cent. of the total estimated cost of £9,285 million for Trident announced by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence in January will be spent in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the total planned annual expenditure on the Trident submarine programme at 1985 prices for the years ending April 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994 and 1995.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Yeovil on 21 June 1985, column 247. It is not the practice to give forecasts of cost profiles for projects on a year by year basis.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria he intends to use in deciding whether all 16 missile tubes on each Trident submarine will be loaded with missiles with nuclear warheads when Trident is operational; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: This will depend on a number of factors, including the capabilities of Soviet defensive systems, and bearing in mind the need to pose a potential threat to key aspects of Soviet state power.

Enfield Weapon (Ejector Mechanism)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what problems have been reported to his Department regarding the ejection mechanism of the Enfield individual weapon.

Mr. Lee: A problem was experienced with the extractor in the light machine gun variant of the Enfield individual weapon, which impaired its reliability. The problem has been fully resolved.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is planning to utilise any sites in the county of Derbyshire during Exercise Brave Defender.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is planning to utilise any sites in the county of Lancashire during Exercise Brave Defender.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West on 28 June 1985 at columns 516-7.

Trident Missile

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what circumstances Her Majesty's Government would increase the total of nuclear warheads currently planned to be equipped to Trident D5 submarine-based ballistic missiles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to comment on warhead numbers.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of all commissioned United Kingdom Trident D5 submarines will be available continually for deployment at sea.

Mr. Stanley: It will be possible to keep three Trident submarines in the operating cycle for a high proportion of the time, and two submarines in the operating cycle at all times. This will enable us to maintain continuously one submarine on patrol.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how often Her Majesty's Government estimates that Trident D5 submarines will require overhauling.

Mr. Adam Butler: It is currently planned that the Trident submarines should have commission times of about seven or eight years between major refits.

Brigadier General Navarrete (Chile)

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will outline the programme arranged for the visit to Britain of Brigadier General Navarrete and his colleagues from Chile.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Spearing) on 2 July.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Falkland Islands

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his latest information as to the quantity and type of fish taken from the sea around the Falkland Islands by foreign ships in the last 12 months; and if he will estimate the value of the catch.

Mr. Renton: The latest estimates available to us, based largely on aerial surveillance of fishing vessels within the Falkland Islands protection zone suggests that the quantity of fish taken within the protection zone during the period June 1984 to May 1985 was roughly 240,000 tonnes. The main species taken were squid, hake and southern blue whiting but the precise composition of the catch is not known. It is not in consequence possible on the basis of the information currently available to us to make any meaningful estimate of its total value.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to conserve fish stocks round the Falkland Islands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs Davison) on 26 June at columns 408-9 we are currently working actively for the establishment of a multilaterally-based conservation and management regime around the Falkland Islands.

Middle East

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's ambassador in Amman has reported to him about the meeting between King Hussein, Yasir Arafat and the Jordanian army commander on 17 June concerning armed men from Al-fatah being allowed to resume guerrilla training on Jordanian soil; and whether any message has been conveyed to the King about this.

Mr. Rifkind: We have regular exchanges of view with the Jordanian Government on the search for a peaceful solution of the Arab/Israel dispute. We cannot confirm the particular decision at the particular meeting mentioned by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what report he has received from Her Majesty's ambassador in Baghdad regarding the claim by the Palestine Liberation Organisation on Voice of Palestine radio in Baghdad on 18 June that eight terrorist attacks had been made in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and other places in Israel on the previous day; and whether any message has been conveyed to the Iraqi Government about these incidents.

Mr. Rifkind: We have noted this claim. Our opposition to the use of violence to solve the Arab/Israel dispute is well known.

Kiribati

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom relations with the Government of Kiribati.

Mr. Renton: Our relations with Kiribati are good. Under arrangements made at independence we are the largest aid donor. We are one of two overseas Governments represented there.

Solomon Islands

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom relations with the Solomon Islands.

Mr. Renton: Our relations with the Solomon Islands are good. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, had talks with the Foreign Minister last month. We attach importance to our representation in the Solomon islands and to our aid programme there.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any new guidelines have been issued to ambassadors and high commissioners based in London concerning the use of diplomatic immunity to avoid prosecution for illegal parking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to paragraph 80 of the recent White Paper on "Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges" (Cmnd. 9497). The vice marshal of the diplomatic corps wrote on 19 April to all heads of mission about illegal parking.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Monetary System

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each month since the establishment of the European monetary system what effect the movement of the pound sterling had on the central rate of the European currency unit in terms of percentage shift.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Information on the effect of changes in the sterling exchange rate on the value of the European currency unit was provided in the form requested to 27 March 1985 in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) on 1 April 1985, at columns 504-506. A change in the exchange rate does not affect a country's central rate against the ECU. Since 17 September 1984, sterling's notional central rate against the ECU has been £0·585992. The table brings the earlier information up to date. All figures are end-month.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each European Economic Community country the percentage change in the real rate of exchange between the Smithsonion agreement and the setting up of the European monetary system, the change between that date and March 1983 and the change since March 1983.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

*Percentage changes in real effective exchange rates

	December 1971-March 1979	March 1979-March 1983	March 1983-February 1985†
Belgium	−3·8	−22·9	−5·1
France	+1·0	−16·1	−0·6
Germany	+5·8	−7·6	−12·3
Italy	−1·7	+2·9	−3·3
Netherlands	−2·4	−6·6	−12·0
United Kingdom	−3·0	+1·9	−6·5

* The nominal effective exchange rate against a basket of other currencies (those shown plus USA, Canada and Japan) has been adjusted by a weighted index of wholesale prices to derive the real effective exchange rate.
† Wholesale prices data not available for non-UK countries after February 1985.
Note: Figures for other EC countries not readily available in above form.

Airports (Duty-free Facilities

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in consultation with the North of England Regional Consortium, he will now review the criteria for providing duty-free facilities at airports to ensure that the smaller regional airports can provide such facilities if they wish to do so.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have already agreed that HM Customs and Excise should review the criteria governing the establishment of duty-free shops at international airports. I await its report.

"Official Report"

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give (a) the cost of printing and publishing Hansard in 1984-85, 1983-84, 1982-83 and 1981-82, respectively, and (b) the corresponding revenue from sales, other than supplies to Parliament, Government Departments and public bodies, in each year.

Mr. Hayhoe: The following is the information:

£000

	Cost	Revenue
1984-85	7,765	1,039
1983-84	7,892	816
1982-83	8,435	850
1981-82	7,870	646

Note: Some public bodies maintain retail accounts with Her Majesty's Stationery Office and the value of such business could only be identified and excluded from the figures shown at disproportionate cost.

THE ARTS

Tate Gallery

Mr. Parry asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts (1) if there are any plans to increase the art collection at the Tate gallery in Liverpool; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the current value of the art collection at the Tate of the North situated in Liverpool.

Mr. William Waldegrave: In March, the Government announced its approval of phase 1 of a proposal to convert part of the old Albert dock warehouse buildings, Liverpool, to form an outstation of the Tate gallery in the north. Building work is about to start with the intention of opening the gallery to the public in the spring of 1988. It will then be for the trustees of the Tate gallery to decide which works of art to display.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Housing Benefit

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of standard housing benefit recipients with capital of over (a) £3,000 and (b) £6,000.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what the estimated savings will be as a result of the proposal in the housing benefit review to exclude students from eligibility for housing benefit and to overhaul the student grant provision for housing cost accordingly; and if the proposed exclusion is (i) total and (ii) still allows benefit to be paid in the long vacation.

Mr. Newton: An estimate of the savings which would result from the housing benefit team's proposal cannot be made until the future structure of the system of student support is known.

Hypothermia

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of pensioners who die of hypothermia each year.

Mr. John Patten: The numbers of deaths registered in 1984, of males aged 65 and over and females aged 60 and over with mention of hypothermia on the death certificate, were 165 and 312, respectively.

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the figures for a proportion of those claimants between the ages of 18 to 25 years in receipt of supplementary benefit at (i) full householder rate, (ii) joint householder rate, that is the difference between (i) and (iii) divided by the number of tenants and (iii) non-householder rate.

Mr. Whitney: The information, based on provisional figures for December 1983, is as follows:

*Claimants aged 18 to 25	Proportion in receipt of supplementary benefit (per cent.)
Householders	30
Joint Householders	2
Non-householders†	68

Notes:
* ie, not including 25 year old claimants
† includes boarders, hospital patients and claimants in residential homes
Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry, December 1983

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many 16 to 17-year-olds have lost or received reduced supplementary benefit because of refusal to take advantage of a youth training scheme in October, November and December 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: Failure to take advantage of a youth training scheme does not result in the cessation of full benefit but may result in a reduction. The number of 16 to 17-year-olds whose supplementary benefit was reduced because of refusal to take advantage of a youth training scheme without good cause in October, November and December of 1984 is given in the table:

4-week periods	26 September 1984 to 23 October 1984	24 October 1984 to 20 November 1984	21 November 1984 to 18 December 1984	19 December 1984 to 15 January 1985
Number who refused to accept or attend schemes	40	42	32	35
Number who prematurely terminated schemes	649	716	579	357
Total	689	758	611	392

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of single claimants aged 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24 and 25 years respectively, received (a) supplementary benefit as a non-householder in April and (b) supplementary benefit in their own right but share their home with people other than parents.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Social Fund

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish draft guidelines necessary for the regulation of repayments made on loans from the proposed social fund, particularly in respect of (i) period of repayment, (ii) scale of repayments and (iii) discretionary powers to waive repayments.

Mr. Newton: We shall, of course, give appropriate information about the working of the proposed fund in these and other respects. How this should be done is a matter for further consideration in the light of consultation, as is the detail of any rules on the particular points raised by the hon. Member.

Family Incomes

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many families in work with dependent children have normal gross weekly incomes, excluding state benefits, in the following income ranges: £90 to £94, £95 to £99, £100 to £104, £105 to £109, £110 to £114, £115 to £119, £120 to £124, £125 to £129, £130 to £134, and £135 to £140; and how many in each income range have (a) one child, (b) two children, (c) three children and (d) four or more children.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is as follows:

Great Britain

Number of Working Families according to Family Size at various income levels

Normal gross weekly income excluding state benefits £	Number of children 1	2	3	4+	All families with children
90-94	48,000	49,000	17,000	5,000	119,000
95-99	42,000	61,000	9,000	3,000	115,000
100-104	58,000	70,000	28,000	11,000	167,000
105-109	63,000	76,000	18,000	8,000	165,000
110-114	49,000	78,000	13,000	5,000	145,000
115-119	60,000	57,000	23,000	8,000	148,000
120-124	65,000	82,000	22,000	5,000	174,000
125-129	102,000	65,000	13,000	11,000	191,000
130-134	73,000	68,000	13,000	3,000	157,000
135-140	96,000	92,000	49,000	19,000	256,000
Total					1,637,000

Notes:
1. The figures are derived from 1981 family expenditure survey data and are subject to sampling error.
2. The figures include those where the family head had been sick or unemployed for less than three months at the time of the survey. In these cases the family's normal income when the head was in work has been used in determining income level.
3. The figures exclude those living in institutions.

Family Expenditure

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be able to publish the 1983 "Family Expenditure Survey" results (a) on take-up and (b) on the numbers of low-income families.

Mr. Whitney: For those benefits where take-up estimates are to be based solely on 1983 family expenditure survey data, results are expected to be available in the autumn. Estimates of numbers of low-income families are also expected to be available about them.

Family Credit

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements will be made for payment of the proposed family credit to self-employed people.

Mr. Newton: Where there is no employer, arrangements for payment of the proposed family credit are likely to be on similar lines to those used generally within the social security system.

Vaccines

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why batches of triple vaccine and polio oral vaccine have been withdrawn from Scottish clinics and hospitals; and if he intends to withdraw any batches in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Following the reported deaths of twin boys in Scotland shortly after immunisation, the batches of the vaccines involved were withdrawn in Scotland and arrangements have been made to ensure that the batches in question are not used in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. These were precautionary measures and pending investigation. There is no reason at present to believe that the vaccines were responsible for the deaths.

National Insurance

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest estimate of the number of (a) men over 65 years of age and (b) women over 60 years of age; and how these figures compare with the current estimate for the total numbers who are currently paying national insurance contributions.

Mr. Whitney: The latest comparable information covering the United Kingdom is for 1983, as follows:

	(Millions)
National Insurance contributors	23·4
Resident population estimates:
Men (65 and over)	3·3
Women (60 and over)	6·8

Monyhull Hospital

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the staffing levels and structural conditions at the Monyhull hospital for the mentally handicapped in south Birmingham.

Mr. John Patten: We are not aware of any particular problems at this hospital. Staffing levels and structural conditions are, of course, the responsibility of local management, in this case the South Birmingham health authority. If the right hon. Member has a particular concern, I suggest he writes direct to the chairman of the South Birmingham health authority giving details.

Diabetes

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which district health authorities do not have (a) a specialist in diabetes or (b) a diabetes specialist nurse.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this information centrally. However, the report by the Royal College of Physicians of London and the British Diabetic Association, "The Provision of Medical Care for Adult Diabetic Patients in the United Kingdom 1984," copies of which I have placed in the Library, does contain the results of a study of the distribution of specialists in diabetes.

Nurses

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nurses were employed in the National Health Service in 1979; and what is the latest available figure.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The total number of nursing and midwifery staff — including learners, unqualified and agency staff—in the National Health Service in England at 30 September 1979 was 358,400 in whole-time equivalent terms, compared with a provisional total of 397,900 at 30 September 1984.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what effect the recommendations of the resouce allocation working party have had on hospital facilities and waiting lists in north Staffordshire;

(2) if he will tabulate, according to the clinical speciality, the number of patients on north Staffordshire who are on waiting lists for (a) urgent treatment and (b) non-urgent treatment; and if he will give the totals in each of these two categories;

(3) if, pending a reduction in hospital waiting lists, he will provide additional resources to enable patients needing urgent attention to be treated at hospitals with short waiting lists in other parts of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what steps he plans to take in conjunction with the West Midlands regional health authority to cut hospital waiting lists in north Staffordshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: National Health Service inpatient waiting lists in September 1984 were almost 70,000 lower than those at March 1979. They would have been lower still but for the industrial action in 1982. Within this national picture, the position varies between health authorities and the latest figures for north Staffordshire are set out in the following table. Responsibility for getting this figure down lies with local management. West Midlands regional health authority has consistently received significant levels of growth money after allowing for pay and prices and, in line with the recommendations of the resource allocation working party, has been allocating an increasing proportion of these funds to those districts furthest from their RAWP targets, including north Staffordshire. In 1985-86 the district, as part of its revenue allocation of almost £80 million, will receive growth money of some £1·5 million, the highest of the region's 22 districts. It is the region's stated policy to continue to move money to its districts which historically have been relatively deprived, and we would expect this shift to be reflected in reductions in waiting lists as the policy takes effect.

Number of persons on inpatient waiting list for admission to NHS hospitals in north Staffordshire DHA on 30 September 1984

Specialty	Urgent cases	Non-urgent cases
General medicine	5	—
Dermatology	—	3
Neurology	—	113
Cardiology	—	146
Rheumatology	—	23
Younger disabled	—	5
General surgery	409	1,787
Ear, nose and throat	20	980
Traumatic and orthopaedic surgery	278	3,021
Ophthalmology	7	558
Urology	—	228
Plastic surgery	1	332
Thoracic surgery	3	24
Neurosurgery	—	64
Gynaecology	30	1,806
Mental handicap	—	4

Specialty	Urgent cases	Non-urgent cases
Mental illness	—	30
Other specialist units	3	12
Total	756	9,136

Footnotes:
Classification as urgent or non-urgent is decided by the clinician in charge as at the date to which the return relates. In general, figures in waiting lists are believed to include a significant proportion of duplicated entries and patients who no longer require treatment. About half of all admissions to hospital are immediate and many of these on waiting lists already have a planned date of admission.

Social Security Review

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the proposed tariff given in paragraph 2.89 of Cmnd. 9518 on reform of social security of 40 pence for each £100 of capital between £3,000 and £6,000 is calculated on the current rate of investment income.

Mr. Newton: No. The proposed rate of tariff reflects both the fact that the first £3,000 of capital and any income derived from it will continue to be ignored and our view that it is reasonable to expect claimants with capital between £3,000 and £6,000, who will gain entitlement to benefit, to draw to some extent on their capital for living expenses.

Benefit Entitlement

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the supplementary benefit capital limit of £3,000 is to be frozen until 1987.

Mr. Newton: We have at present no plans to change the £3,000 capital limit for supplementary benefit.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under the proposals in Cmnd. 9518, "Reform of Social Security," what benefit entitlement the under 25-year-olds will have if (a) they are married or cohabit and (b) they have children or a child; and whether special rates for the under 25-year-olds apply to those who are incapable of work as well as the unemployed.

Mr. Newton: Claimants aged under 25 who are married, or who are living together, would receive a separate rate of benefit for married couples under 25. Those under 25 who have children and those who are incapable of work would be eligible for premium rates of benefit on the same basis as other claimants.

Work Experts

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average level of work expenses taken into account when calculating earnings disregarded for the latest available year.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Members for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and for Pontypridd (Mr. John) on 13 June at column 559. I regret that there was an error in that reply in that the information about average costs was based on all lone parents in the study who were working and not just on those who incurred work expenses.

Single Parents

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single parents are claiming income supplement; what is their current average earnings disregard; what is the present average level disregard in relation to fares to work; what is the present average disregard for meals; and how many single parents claiming family income supplement earn £5, £10, £15, £25, £30, £35, £40 and £45 per week, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: At the end of March 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, 82,000 one-parent families were receiving family income supplement (FIS). There are no disregards for earnings, fares to work or meals within the FIS scheme. Statistics relating to earnings levels are kept within bands and on this basis the information, which includes the self-employed, is as follows:

Gross earnings range £	Numbers (to the nearest 1000)
Nil–19·99	1,000
20·00–24·99	1,000
25·00–29·99	2,000
30·00–34·99	4,000
35·00–39·99	3,000
40·00–44·99	7,000
45·00–49·99	8,000
50·00 or more	56,000

Child Abuse

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he proposes to issue a consultative paper setting out new guidelines on the role of local authorities in detecting and handling child abuse cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Benefits

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the combined rate of income support and personal allowance under his Green Paper proposals that would be required in 1985-86 to compensate a single pensioner who lost (a) heating addition, (b) clothing and dietary addition and (c) the average single payment, assuming additional resources to cover 20 per cent. of rates bills;

(2) what is the combined rate of income support and personal allowance that would be required in 1985-86 to compensate an unemployed person who loses (a) heating addition, (b) clothing and dietary addition and (c) the average single payment, assuming additional resources to cover 20 per cent. of rates bills;

(3) what is the combined rate of income support personal allowance and family premium that would be required in 1985-86 to compensate (a) a single parent and (b) a married couple who loses (i) heating addition, (ii) clothing and dietary addition and (iii) the average single payment, assuming additional resources to cover 20 per cent. of rates bills.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 7 June 1985, c. 290-91]: The information is not available in the form requested. However, so far as the current supplementary benefit scheme is concerned and on the basis of the assumptions set out, present possible entitlements of each of these types of claimants are as follows:

Pensioners (single householder)	40·82
Unemployed
(single householder)	34·17
(married couple)	51·67
Lone Parent (single householder)
—on ordinary scale rate	34·17
—on long term scale rate	40·82

The assumptions are:

—that 1984 scale rates are in payment.
—that where the additional requirements are standard, the lower rate is in payment.
—that where the additional requirement is not standard the average amount based on the latest available data (for December 1983) is in payment.
—account is taken of the available scale margin where relevant.

No account is taken of single payments since they do not form part of weekly requirements.

Social Security Costs

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the average cost to the Exchequer of a single person on social security; what is his estimate of the cost to the Exchequer of an average family on social security; and what was the total cost to the Exchequer of social security and unemployment benefits in the latest financial year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 27 June 1985, c. 476]: The estimated average weekly payment of supplementary benefit in December 1983 was £16·54 for single people without dependants and £45·04 for couples with two children. These estimates do not include the cost of single payments, urgent needs payments and other "immediate" payments.

The estimated total cost in 1984-85 of unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit was £7,960 million. The estimated yield from the taxation of these benefits was about £625 million. Estimates of tax losses depend on a variety of assumptions, and meaningful estimates are not possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Textile Clothing Industry

15. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has had about the future of the textile clothing industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of recent representations in favour of the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement beyond July 1986, and others requesting Government assistance for the textile and clothing industries following the European Commission's rejection of the proposed CLOFT scheme.

Waste Recycling

18. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with co-ordinating responsibility for waste recycling has had with representatives of the recycling industry.

Mr. Trippier: I met representatives of the United Kingdom reclamation council on 12 March and I expect to have a further meeting with them before the summer recess. I shall also be having informal discussions with representatives of the recycling industry when I visit Warren Spring laboratory on 10 July.

Non-oil Visible Trade

19. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the deficit in non-oil visible trade for the first quarter of 1985.

Mr. Fletcher: Non-oil visible trade showed a deficit of £3·2 billion in the first quarter of this year. At the same time, the current account as a whole was broadly in balance despite the effects of the coal dispute.

"Support for Business"

20. Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what response he has received to his publication, "Support for Business".

Mr. Tebbit: Since support for business was issued in April, the London central inquiry point, whose number is given in the booklet, has received just under 1,800 telephone calls about DTI support schemes.

The regional inquiry points have also received many calls in response to the booklet.

Steel Industry

21. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will next meet the chairman of the British Steel Corporation to discuss the proposed corporate plan for the steel industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I meet the BSC Chairman from time to time to discuss major issues including the Corporation's planning. At present no further meetings have been arranged.

New Companies

22. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many new companies were registered in Britain in the last 12 months.

Mr. Trippier: In the 12 months June 1984 to May 1985, there were 102,000 new company registrations in Great Britain.

British Leyland

23. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the implications for the level of employment within BL of the recently agreed corporate plan.

Mr. Norman Lamont: None.

30. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received since his statement on the BL corporate plan.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Since my right hon. Friend's announcement, he has received two letters from hon. Members about the possible effect on BL's suppliers if the company were to purchase the bulk of its engine requirements from Honda. My right hon. Friend made it clear to the House at the time of the announcement that this was not proposed, and that the Government supported BL's proposals in the field of engine development and manufacture.

Craft and Starter Workshops

24. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy towards the promotion of craft and starter workshops; how many have been started in each of the last three years; and what has been the level of Government support.

Mr. Trippier: It is our policy to encourage the development of craft and starter workshops. I am arranging for a table to be published in the Official Report giving details of small workshops funded by Government agencies which have been started in the last three years. Figures for the level of financial support are not available.

China

25. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has made any estimate of the possible growth in imports of textile and clothing goods from the People's Republic of China in the next five years.

Mr. Trippier: United Kingdom imports of textiles from China are subject to the provisions of the EC-China textile agreement which last until the end of 1988, but their growth will also be affected by various commercial factors. This Agreement falls within the multi-fibre arrangement, and we are pressing for this to be renewed for 4-5 years from July 1986.

School Mini-enterprises

26. Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many school mini-enterprises are now in existence.

Mr. Butcher: It is estimated that at the moment more than 1,500 mini-enterprises are operating in schools.

British Computer Companies

27. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received recently advocating further measures designed to protect the commercial interests of British computer companies in the light of trading practices of foreign competitors.

Mr. Butcher: We have received no such representations.

Japan

28. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the visible trade deficit with Japan has been reduced in the first half of 1985 as compared with the equivalent period in 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest available figures show that our provisional bilateral trade deficit with Japan in the first five months of 1985 was £1,331 million compared with £1,169 million in the corresponding period last year.

Iran (Talbot Car Kits)

29. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current position with regard to the Talbot contract to supply car kits to Iran.

Mr. Butcher: I understand the Talbot Motor Company have signed an agreement with the relevant Iranian authorities for cash payments in respect of car kits and aim to re-start production at their Stoke plant on August 5.

Job Creation

31. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about jobs created as a result of Government grants under section 8 of the Industry Act.

Mr. Trippier: In contrast to section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982, which is specifically about employment in the assisted areas, section 8 schemes and project support contribute only indirectly to jobs because their thrust is towards economic benefit and the national interest generally. Job creation is not a criterion for section 8 support, so we do not keep records of jobs directly created. However, I am confident that assistance aimed at improving the ability of United Kingdom industry to compete worldwide can only assist in preserving and creating employment over time.

Small Firms

32. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many business counsellors are under contract to his Department's small firms service.

Mr. Trippier: There are 286 business counsellors under contract to the Department of Trade and Industry's small firms service.

34. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what studies he makes of the relative performance of the small firms sector in other countries.

Mr. Trippier: My Department regularly monitors the policies of other countries in respect of small firms. Indeed, I am visiting the United States in two weeks' time and I will take the opportunity to discuss the United States approach to a wide range of small business issues.

Aerospace Industry

35. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met representatives of the British aerospace industry to discuss the implications for the industry of collaborative aircraft projects.

Mr. Butcher: As part of a regular exchange of views with representatives of the British aerospace industry my hon. Friend has recently discussed the implications for the industry of collaborative aircraft projects.

Brim Measure Beer Glasses

36. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the report of the Eden committee about implementation of section 19 of the Weights and Measures Act 1979 outlawing brim measure beer-glasses.

Mr. Butcher: I believe that it would be premature to consider implementing section 19 of the Weights and Measures Act 1979 until alternative voluntary measures have been explored and consultation on the Eden committee report has been completed.

European Community Trade Mark Office

37. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the progress to date in his Department's efforts to promote the cause of a United Kingdom location for the proposed European Community Trade Mark Office.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. Our Community partners and the European Commission have been made well aware that it is the Government's firm desire that the office should be located in london. The Government expect to recommend a particular site to the Commission later this year.

Business Improvement Services

38. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the take-up of grants by small companies under the business improvement services.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. As at 31 May 1985 my Department had made 1,066 offers of grant, worth £5,977,969 in the English regions. I am very pleased with this result.

Chemical Weapons (Iran)

39. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what licences have been issued in 1985 for the export of chemical weapons or of weapons-grade chemicals to Iraq.

Mr. Butcher: None.

Small Businessess (Venture Capital)

40. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with banks concerning taking more risks in the provision of venture capital to small business; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Government have sought through initiatives such as the loan guarantee scheme and the business expansion scheme to improve small firms' access to finance. I hope that a secondary effect of these schemes will be to change the attitude of financial institutions, including banks, to risk taking. I will continue to discuss these matters with a variety of financial institutions.

44. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to encourage local enterprise agencies to set up business expansion scheme funds which specialise in channelling venture capital of under £50,000 to small firms.

Mr. Trippier: I am anxious that local enterprise agencies should be fully aware of the benefits which the business expansion scheme can offer to potential investors and small companies. I am therefore considering issuing guidance notes designed to inform them of ways in which they might help bring together investors and companies seeking small scale equity capital.

Tobacco Products

41. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the total volume and value of imports of tobacco products into the United Kingdom in each year since 1979.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is as follows:

	Volume (000's Kg)	Value (000's £)
1979	13,774	45,258
1980	13,122	56,041
1981	13,131	49,732
1982	13,146	68,866
1983	14,864	64,660
1984	21,675	67,089

New Businesses

42. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many new businesses were registered; and how many businesses ceased trading over the last 12 months.

Mr. Trippier: The most recently available figures for 1984 show that 170,000 new businesses started up and 120,000 ceased trading. These figures, which are based upon VAT returns, are liable to revision but the eventual surplus of starts over stops is expected to be in excess of 35,000.

Small Firms Centres

43. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to set up additional small firms centres; what liaison there is between existing centres and local enterprise agencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: In May my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland opened the 13th small firms centre in Edinburgh. I have no plans to provide additional small firms centres at this time.

There is considerable and close contact between the small firms service and local enterprise agencies. SFS counselling now takes place in some LEA offices; the LEAs make extensive use of SFS publications; and SFS managers and LEA directors meet regularly. I am encouraging the development of these contacts.

Conferences and Tourism

45. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage the United Kingdom conference tourism market.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government recognise that the conference sector is an important element of the tourism market. It is one of the functions of the statutory tourist boards to encourage the development of this sector, and the British Tourist Authority seeks to promote Britain as a venue for international conferences through co-operation with commercial interests, by providing information and advisory literature and by maintaining a data bank of forthcoming international events.

Origin Marking

33. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received about the EEC Court of Justice decision of 25 April about article 30 of the Treaty of Rome and origin marking.

Mr. Fletcher: Apart from my hon. Friend's own letter of 20 May, five letters have been received from other hon. Members and four letters from members of the public. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Butcher) and I have answered questions from three hon. Members on the subject.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report for each year since 1970 the share of imports of manufactures into the United States of America taken by the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy and Japan, respectively.

Mr. Fletcher: The information is in the table. Data for 1984 in respect of France and Italy are not readily available.

Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his reply dated 20 June, Official Report, column 174, concerning the profitability of exports, what has been the effect of the increase in profitability on the United Kingdom share of world trade in manufactures since 1973 to 1976 and on the United Kingdom share of the United Kingdom market for comparable goods.

Mr. Fletcher: The United Kingdom share of both the home market and of world trade have declined in recent years, as have these shares for other comparable countries. It is not possible to separate the effect of profitability of exports from other factors such as competitiveness in design, delivery performance and reliability.

Employment Creation

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he plans to encourage employment creation in the more economically deprived areas of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: The new regional industrial policy, details of which were announced last November, is designed specifically to encourage the creation of jobs in those parts of the country which the Government consider to have the greatest need for future employment opportunities.

Aerospace

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the national share in the European Space Agency, EUTELSAT and Airbus Industrie, respectively.

Mr. Butcher: The Government's contribution will represent some 13·8 per cent. of the European Space Agency 1985 budgets. British Telecom plc holds a 16·4 per cent. share in EUTELSAT, and British Aerospace plc a 20.0 per cent. share in Airbus Industrie.

Stock Exchange

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the operation of the Restrictive Trade Practices (Stock Exchange) Act 1984 and on the extent to which undertakings given by the Stock Exchange Council prior to the passage of the Act have so far been implemented.

Mr. Fletcher: Since the ending of the restrictive practices court proceedings against the Stock Exchange, the Stock Exchange has put in hand a far-reaching programme of reform including the measures agreed with the Government in 1983. There have been major changes in the previous rules on non-member ownership of firms; lay members have been admitted to the council; an appeal body has been established to review refusals of Stock Exchange membership; and a majority of lay persons has been introduced onto the appeal committee on disciplinary matters. New dealing systems have been promulgated and the first steps taken towards dismantling minimum commission scales. The council's policy remains to complete the reforms within the deadline of 31 December 1986 agreed with the Government.

Tourism

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the outcome of the inquiry into tourism to be concluded; if he will obtain a copy for the inquiry of the evidence presented by the north of England regional consortium to the Trade and Industry Committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The work on tourism being carried out under the chairmanship of the Minister without Portfolio is likely to be completed before the end of this month. The north of England regional consortium has already sent to the Minister without Portfolio a copy of the evidence on tourism which it gave to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry.

Regional Policy

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the effectiveness of the Government's regional policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The revised regional policy, with its emphasis on job creation, is more directly related to reducing disparities in employment opportunities and will be more cost-effective than its predecessors. However, it has been in operation for only a few months and full assessment of its effects will not be possible for some time.

Technological Exports (China)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will increase the number of staff in his Department dealing with applications for licensing in relation to exporting high-level communications and instrumentation to China.

Mr. Fletcher: We have recently done so, and are keeping the position under review.

South Africa

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why his Department is analysing the sections of companies' responses under the EC code of conduct which relate to pay on the basis of supplementary living levels which are in general 30 per cent. higher than the minimum living levels rather than on the basis of minimum living levels plus 50 per cent.; and when his Department intends to analyse responses on the basis of the 50 per cent. plus basis called for in the EC Code itself.

Mr. Fletcher: The code of conduct does not define precisely the target level of pay for black African workers. The explanatory guidance published with the code in Cmnd. 7233 interprets this target as equivalent to either of two recognised independent standards. In common with the great majority of reporting companies, my Department has adopted the supplemented living level for a family of five as the most appropriate standard. I have no plans to change this practice.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in a case where a company has used a poverty datum level other than that used by his Department in its analysis of company responses under the EC code for companies with interests in South Africa, how he calculates the number of those employees in grades above the lowest paid grade who are paid at a level above the upper datum level used by the company and below the level used by the Department without further reference to the companies concerned.

Mr. Fletcher: Reference is made to the companies concerned, both in the United Kingdom and in South Africa, if such problems arise.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the companies submitting full reports under the EC code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa for the period ended June 1984 used, in responding to section 3 of the code, the supplementary living level or minimum living level plus 50 per cent. for families of size 5 in areas where the all households (average) level was higher.

Mr. Fletcher: As indicated in my reply to the hon. Member on 21 May 1985, average family sizes in different regions of South Africa are not known. The all households (averge) data tabulated in surveys are statistical means and do not relate to actual family sizes.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies submitting reports under the EC code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa for the period ended in June 1984 do not include all of their women employees, in their responses to all the parts of section 3 of the reporting format on pay; and if Her Majesty's Government ask any further questions of such companies.

Mr. Fletcher: Reports from 10 companies gave insufficient information about the wages paid to some female employees. The companies concerned were invited to amplify their reports.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies his Department questioned further on any matter relating to their responses to the EC code for companies with interests in South Africa for the period ended 30 June 1984; and what were the broad areas of such inquiries.

Mr. Fletcher: The information requested could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The subsidiaries of all the major British companies reporting under the code are visited in South Africa at least once a year, and less important companies somewhat less frequently. Reports are discussed with companies in the United Kingdom as necessary. All aspects of the code may be covered by such discussions.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many of the 77 companies making clear that their response to the EC code for companies with interests in South Africa for the period ended June 1984 was available from the company also made clear that its availability was indicated in their annual report and accounts.

Mr. Fletcher: All.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether all companies are reminded of the Government's policy to encourage them to comply fully with the code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa at the same time; or whether they are reminded on an individual basis.

Mr. Fletcher: All British companies known, or thought, to have interests in South Africa warranting a report under the code are periodically reminded individually of the Government's policy to encourage companies to comply fully with the code.

Director General of Telecommunications (Report)

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is yet in a position to announce a date for the publication of the report by the Director General of Telecommunications for 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The first report by the Director-General of Telecommunications is being published today. It covers the period 5 August 1984 to 31 December 1984. Copies of the report have been laid before Parliament.

Glanford and Scunthorpe

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many factory units, giving the floor space in each case, English Industrial Estates have constructed in Glanford and Scunthorpe since 1981; what is the total cost of construction; and how many have been occupied, by how many companies and how many jobs created.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 2 July 1985, c. 92]: The following factory units have been built by the English Industrial Estates Corporation in Glanford and Scunthorpe since 1981 at a total cost of about £6·3 million:

	Glanford	Scunthorpe	Total
Number of units constructed	45	11	56
Total floorspace (m ^{2})	11,804	15,462	27,266

Forty one of the units have been occupied at one time or another by a total of 40 companies, employing up to 524 workers. At present 36 units are occupied by 29 companies employing 434 workers. It is not practicable to estimate the number of jobs that would have been created as the sole consequence of these premises.

Whale and Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what whale or turtle products have been purchased by his Department during the past five years.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 2 July 1985, c. 92]: My Department does not keep records of purchases of whale or turtle products: the information in question is not available.

PRIME MINISTER

Falkland Islands

Q9. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will seek discussions with the Government of Argentina about fishing and related ecological problems, including conservation of Antarctic cod and the protection of black-browed albatrosses and rockhopper penguins in the area around the Falklands.

The Prime Minister: We are actively working for the establishment of a multilaterally-based fisheries conservation and management regime around the Falkland Islands. We are conscious of the wider conservation issues involved, and the Falkland Islands have comprehensive legislation in the sphere of conservation and protection of the environment.

EC Internal Market (White Paper)

Q11. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what consideration she has given to the White Paper on the completion of the internal market which was prepared by the European Commission at the request of the Fontainebleau summit; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Much of the White Paper accords with our own objectives for the completion of the Common Market. The Milan European Council endorsed these objectives as a high priority. Some of the other Commission proposals such as those on tax approximation and the abolition of frontier controls involve obvious difficulties for all member states. The European Council remitted the question of tax approximation for further study by the Council of Ministers for Financial Affairs.

Human Tissue (Member's Correspondence)

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister when she intends to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras about the buying and selling of human tissue.

The Prime Minister: I replied to the hon. Gentleman on 17 June 1985.

Engagements

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Sir John Farr asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Adley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Colvin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

ENERGY

Geothermal Energy Sources

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are his proposals for future funding of research into geothermal energy sources.

Mr. David Hunt: In a statement to Parliament on 2 July in answer to a question by my hon. Friend on the review of renewable energy by the Advisory Council on Research and Development, I said that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy and I had accepted ACORD's advice to discontinue work on geothermal aquifers in order to concentrate resources into more promising technologies. The programme on geothermal hot dry rocks will continue and will be further reviewed when the present phase of the experiment at Rosemanowes in Cornwall is complete.

Magnox Reactors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide information on the thermal energy generated and spent fuel discharged by each of the Central Electricity Generating Board magnox reactors in the fiscal year 1984-85; and if he will update to 31 March the information on the allocation of plutonium produced in the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board magnox reactors given in his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on 25 January, Official Report, columns 545-47.

Mr. Goodlad: The thermal output generated and spent fuel discharged for each of the CEGB's magnox stations in 1984-85 was as follows:

Station	Thermal output (Gwh)	Fuel Discharged (tonnes u)
Bradwell	7,084	69
Berkeley	3,568	25
Hinkley Point A	14,479	103

Dungeness A	10,345	87
Sizewell	8,081	76
Oldbury	11,352	80
Wylfa	25,916	223

Information on plutonium production in CEGB and SSEB magnox reactors is currently being updated and will be provided shortly.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what volume of spent irradiated nuclear fuel was imported for reprocessing at British Nuclear Fuel Ltd's Sellafield plant in 1984.

Mr. Goodlad: During the calendar yar 1984, 299 tonnes of irradiated magnox and oxide fuel (measured by the weight of uranium originally contained in the fuel) were imported for reprocessing at BNFL Sellafield.

North Sea Oilfields

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total output of the North sea oilfields in 1984-85; how this output compares with that in the previous 10 years; and what are his Department's latest projections for future output.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Details of the total output of North sea oilfields, on a calendar year basis, are published annually in "Development of Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom", copies of which are in the House of Commons Library. Appendices 8 and 16 of the 1985 issue provide the information sought.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Statistics)

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many full-time and part-time teachers are 50 years old, or older; and what proportion they represent of the total number of teachers in each category.

Mr. Dunn: In March 1984, the latest date for which information is available, there were 40,700 full-time qualified teachers in maintained nursery and primary schools in England and Wales; in maintained secondary schools there were 35,800 such teachers. They represented, respectively, 23·5 per cent. and 14·8 per cent. of all full-time qualified teachers in those types of school. The age distribution of part-time teachers is not readily available.

Hampshire Schools

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the schools in Hampshire visited by Her Majesty's Inspectorate and the dates of the inspections in each case.

Mr. Dunn: The most recent information available is that for the spring term of 1985, and is as follows:

Universities (National Insurance Contributions)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what recent representations he has received concerning changes in employers' national insurance contributions announced in the Budget as they affect universities; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) whether he is yet in a position to announce his policy for university funding in the light of the Budget changes in employers' national insurance contributions; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has received representations from hon. Members, the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals and others about the cost to universities of the proposed changes in employers' national insurance contributions. The possibility of providing additional funds is under consideration and it is not yet possible to say when an announcement will be made.

Handicapped Students

Mr. Malins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what provision his Department makes for the inspection of private colleges for special education of handicapped students and for the review of the level of their residential fees.

Mr. Brooke: The decision to terminate by 1 April 1982 the former voluntary arrangements under which independent establishments of further education could apply to the Department for "recognition as efficient" was announced in the House on 11 November 1980, at column 131. Since 1982 there have been no arrangements for the inspection of such colleges. The Department has never been involved in the setting of fee levels at independent educational establishments.

ENVIRONMENT

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the 1985-86 rate support grant supplementary report will be published.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have laid this report before the House today, together with the "Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (No. 3) 1982-83".

The 1985-86 report demonstrates the consequences for ratepayers in those areas where local authorities have exceeded their spending targets.

Authorities were informed last December of their spending targets and of the grant holdback if they exceeded these targets. Despite this notice, a minority of authorities have chosen to overspend. They forgo £550 million of central Government grant as a result. Information about authorities spending plans for 1985-86 indicates they will over-run by £278 million the guidance I issued last December. £550 million is only 6·5 per cent. of the total of block grant of nearly £8,500 million, but for the ratepayers in the high spending areas the consequences of their authorities' decisions are severe.

Despite the overspending by a minority of authorities, it is good that the excess this year is markedly less than in 1984-85. This is a tribute to the success of the Rates Act. The Act has curbed the extravagance of the most profligate local authorities which in the past have been able to rifle the pockets of their ratepayers ruthlessly and with impunity. As we promised, the Government have come to these ratepayers' rescue.

The 1985-86 report also implements three established disregards, excluding from the calculation of grant holdback certain expenditure under the urban programme, on civil defence, and on schemes jointly financed with health authorities.

The report also announces that a new disregard has been agreed for 1985-86, for expenditure incurred by a local authority in contributing to any appeal to help victims or their dependents following a disaster leading to loss of life. This will be implemented in a subsequent supplementary report when sufficient information of authorities' spending under this head is available. The Government announced this disregard on 17 May in response to requests from local authorities following the Bradford fire disaster.

Three local authorities have so far failed to provide any information about their planned expenditure for 1985-86. I have therefore made estimates for Liverpool city council, Leicester City council and the London borough of Camden on the basis of the best information available to me. I shall reconsider these estimates when I have better information about these authorities' planned expenditure in 1985-86 and, if appropriate, make a further supplementary report for 1985-86.

I intend that the 1982-83 third supplementary report should "close the books" in the light of audited outturn expenditure information for all local authorities in 1982-83. There is no change to the total of grant and holdback for 1982-83, but there are small changes within the total for all authorities.

Sulphur Emissions

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Government intend to sign the protocol on the reduction of sulphur emissions, which is expected to be agreed at the meeting of the executive body for the convention on long-range transboundary air pollution in Helsinki on 8 to 12 July, and so join the 30 per cent. club.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government fully share the general will in Europe to overcome the environmental problems associated with transboundary air pollution. We have announced our aim of achieving a further reduction in sulphur dioxide emissions of 30 per cent. from the 1980 levels by the end of the 1990s. This would represent a total reduction in United Kingdom emissions of 47 per cent. from the peak levels in 1970. The protocol takes no account of the substantial emission reductions achieved by the United Kingdom before 1980. The Government consider that it would be wrong to commit the United Kingdom to the levels of investment that would be required to guarantee a reduction in sulphur dioxide emission by 1993 of 30 per cent. on the 1980 levels and we shall not, therefore, be signing the protocol in Helsinki.

Water Metering

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make a statement on the report of the Watts committee on water metering.

Mr. Macfarlane: After I have received the report and considered its implications. The committee awaits the results of work by consultants on the economics of metering and hopes to report soon thereafter.

Housing Revenue Accounts

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the local authorities in England and Wales which showed a surplus on their housing revenue account in each year since 1982.

Sir George Young: Local authorities in England which made net transfers from their housing revenue accounts to their general rate funds are as follows. The information is provided by local authorities in their housing subsidy claim forms. My Department does not collect information from local authorities in Wales.

Sporting Bodies (Grants)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what grants have been paid to individual sporting bodies in each of the past 10 years; what grants are projected for the same bodies in 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have placed in the Library details of grants paid to individual governing bodies of sport by the Sports Council over the past 10 years. The council's budget for grants to governing bodies for 1985-86 and 1986-87 is £6·295 million and £7·587 million respectively. The breakdown between individual sports in those years has yet to be determined.

Association of County Councils

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has been notified by the Association of County Councils of any change in the composition of the association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have no such notification, but this is a matter which falls entirely within the responsibility of the association.

Inner City Areas

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the amounts of financial assistance, given in all forms, to inner city areas for 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977, 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Water Authorities

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the actual capital expenditure in 1984-85 of each of the water authorities before allowing for grants and contributions; and if he will list these figures for the previous five years and give his best estimates for the years 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 before allowing for grants and contributions at either 1985-86 prices or estimated outturn prices for each of the authorities.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information requested is as follows:

Broad Street Station

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether at any time Broad Street station has been recommended for listing by an investigator; and what professional advice was received by the Department on each occasion that the building was previously considered for listing in 1971, 1975 and 1981.

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall answer this question shortly.

Solar Energy

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take into consideration developments in the design of passive solar energy when revisions are next made to building regulations.

Sir George Young: Allowance for passive solar gain is permitted for commercial and industrial buildings in the present regulations. After the new system of building control has been brought into operation later this year, the requirements for the conservation of fuel and power will be reviewed. This review will include consideration of developments in the design of passive solar energy.

Radionuclides (Sellafield)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will update to calendar years 1983 and 1984 the information on discharges of radionuclides to sea from the Sellafield site given in National Radiological Protection Board Paper R171; and what proportion of the plutonium contained in the discharges made to sea from the Sellafield site up to 31 December 1984 is estimated to have originated in the magnox reactors of the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 3 July 1985: The information requested for 1983 is given in the table. The equivalent figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Figures for the proportion of liquid discharges from the Sellafield site from various sources were given in paragraphs 3.9 and 3.10 of the Black report, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. About 70 per cent. of the total alpha discharge is attributable to storage and reprocessing of magnox fuel from the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board nuclear power stations.

TRANSPORT

Airport Security

61. Mr. Greg Knight: asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the security arrangements at British airports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: British airports have achieved a good standard of security. All UK airport authorities have been asked to reinforce their efforts to ensure that security measures are fully complied with. My right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Transport last week held an urgent meeting with some of the major airport and airline interests represented on the National Aviation Security Committee to review security measures in the United Kingdom. I pressed the importance of the need for international co-operation on this matter at a meeting of the International Civil Aviation Organisation in Montreal last Thursday.

Motorists (Drink Problems)

62. Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he will take to aid the better identification of motorists with a drink problem.

Mrs. Chalker: A scheme for the identification of drivers with a possible drink problem has been in operation since May 1983. It applies to anyone disqualified twice within 10 years for driving with more than two and a half times the legal limit of alcohol in the body or, alternatively, once for driving at more than two and a half times the legal limit and once for failure to provide a specimen. Such offenders are investigated by the Secretary of State's medical adviser at the end of their second disqualification period and, if there is evidence of a drink problem, a driving licence is withheld until the person has demonstrated that his condition is under effective control.

I shall consider the scope for extending this scheme by, for example, lowering the threshold for investigation in the light of experience of these arrangements.

Blind People (Travel Facilities)

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider introducing arrangements for the county societies for the blind and local clubs to be involved during the planning stages of alterations to roads and railways.

Mrs. Chalker: British Rail already has a well developed system for consultation at both national and local level where alterations to the railway affect disabled people. Other railways, such as the Tyne and Wear Metro, have similar systems.

My Department consults groups and organisations of all kinds where they are directly affected by national road proposals. Notification of road proposals is, however, normally made through national organisations. I shall be happy to include one or more national organisations representing blind people in the standard distribution list if they so wish.

Cycling

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the amount of money spent by his Department to promote cycling safety campaigns in 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mrs. Chalker: Expenditure by the Department of Transport to promote pedal cycle safety in the years 1983-84 and 1984-85 was £845,600 and £1,058,000 respectively.

Vehicle Testing

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether there is any statistical evidence that the Ministry of Transport test has not been sufficiently stringent to avoid road accidents caused by defective vehicles.

Mrs. Chalker: There is no recent evidence. A study by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory in the early 1970s showed that mechanical defects were a main contributory factor in about 8 per cent. of accidents. Since then the stringency of the test has been increased in a number of respects, for instance by requiring brakes to be examined on a roller brake tester rather than by a road test.

Railways (Safety)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise with him the safety standards of the new class 455 electrical unit, with particular reference to the operation of the pneumatic sliding doors and fire prevention requirements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The safety standards of rolling stock on Brtish Railways is a matter for the British Railways Board. The Department's Chief Inspecting Officer of Railways has already raised with the board the disquiet felt by some passengers about the emergency evacuation arrangements in recent designs of electric multiple-unit trains, including the class 455. The board has to take into account the need for proper means of escape in an emergency and the need to protect passengers against the dangers of alighting on to lines which may be open to traffic and fitted with high-voltage conductor rails. Some improvements have already been made and the board is currently examining the whole question of emergency evacuation of sliding-door rolling stock.

Humberside Airport

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many passengers departing for destinations abroad used Humberside airport during the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Humberside airport was used by 63,460 passengers on commercial international flights in 1984. Approximately half of these would be departing passengers.

Motorways (Construction Costs)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current average cost per mile of new motorway construction; and how this figure compares with five, 10, 15 and 20 years ago in historic and constant prices, respectively.

Mr. Ridley: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Rural dual 3-lane £ million	Rural dual 2-lane £ million	Urban dual 3-lane £ million	Urban dual 2-lane £ million

Constant prices at average 1982-83 prices, revalued using the roads output index.

* Consistent indices for calculating constant prices for motorway building unavailable prior to 1974.

† Provisional.

Motorway construction costs per mile vary significantly depending on the standard and location of the road concerned. The figures in the table represent very broad average costs by type of motorway and do not reflect accurately the costs of building specific motorways at particular times. In addition to works expenditure, additional costs such as land acquisition may add between 20 and 30 per cent. to the costs of building motorways.

British Rail

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what new initiatives British Rail is taking on a national level to make known to passengers the facilities it offers, the standards it seeks to achieve, and the procedures customers should follow if the service does not satisfy them.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that BR is today publishing a "Code of Practice" which it has prepared in conjunction with the Central Transport Consultative Committee. The code provides a general guide to rail travel and the standards of service the board aims to achieve.

I think it is a good thing that the board is producing such a document, which I am sure its customers will find informative and useful. I believe BR plans to distribute copies to all Members of Parliament and the TUCCs, and that copies will be available at all BR stations and travel agents.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Court Appeals

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Attorney-General what is the estimated cost of court and staff time involved in a hearing in the Crown court of an appeal against sentence.

The Attorney-General: £80.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Attorney-General what is the average cost to the legal aid fund of a legally aided hearing in the Crown court of an appeal against sentence.

The Attorney-General: The latest period for which figures are available is the last quarter of 1984. The average cost was then £177.

Bail Applications

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Attorney-General what is the estimated cost of an application for bail pending appeal to a judge in chambers.

The Attorney-General: Application is to the Crown court. The estimated cost is £40.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Tiger (Portavogie)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has received any complaints about a tiger in Portavogie; and if he is satisfied with the enclosure in which the tiger is presently housed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have received no such complaints other than from the right hon. Gentleman. It is the responsibility of the district council to take action if it is felt that an animal is so kept as to constitute a public health nuisance. I understand there is no evidence at present to suggest that such action is necessary.

Nursing Homes

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing the number of registered nursing homes and private clinics and the number of beds available in them in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: Twenty-eight premises, providing 654 beds, are registered under the Nursing Homes and Nursing Agencies Act (Northern Ireland) 1971. Three of the premises, providing 114 beds, are registered as carrying out surgical procedures.

Hospital Inpatient Costs

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing hospital inpatient costs by type of hospital, expressed in pounds per patient per week for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is as follows:

Type of Hospital	Cost per patient per week (year ended 31 March 1984) £
Acute	356
Mainly Acute	423
Partly Acute	354
Sub Acute	311
Mainly Long Stay	346

Housing Benefit

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the numbers of people in Northern Ireland in receipt of housing benefit; and how many of these are (a) pensioners, (b) housing executive tenants, (c) low-income recipients not in receipt of supplementary benefit and (d) householders in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Chris Patten: The total number of housing benefit recipients at 15 March 1985 was just over 189,600. This included some

(a) 84,800 pensioners;
(b) 114,600 Housing Executive tenants;
(c) 67,400 persons not receiving supplementary benefit, and
(d) 122,200 householders in receipt of supplementary benefit.

WALES

Households

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will publish household projections similar to those published by the Department of the Environment for England.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The current household projections for Wales have circulated already to all local authorities in Wales and are freely available on request. I am sending the hon. Gentleman a copy. The projections will also be published in the next volume of "Welsh Housing Statistics".

A55

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the earliest and latest completion dates for each section of the A55 dual carriageway.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Individual schemes are provisionally programmed for a start within defined time bands, not on the basis of completion dates. My present assessment of progress with the A55 schemes now started, or in preparation is:

	*Current Provisional Start Date	Approximate Length of Contract (years)

Road Construction

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the number of miles of new and improved roads in Wales which are under construction or have been completed since 1979 under schemes approved by his Department.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Since May 1979, 100 miles of new and improved roads have been completed in schemes costing £1 million or more, and 23 miles are presently under construction.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the woodlands for which felling licences for the conversion of the land to agriculture were issued in the Forestry Commission's north and south Wales conservancies, respectively, in the years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales when the rate support grant supplementary reports for 1983-84 and 1985-86 will be published.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have today laid before Parliament the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1983-84 which adjusts local authorities' grant entitlement for the year using final information on expenditure outturns and interest rates. This data shows that fewer authorities have exceeded their targets than at budget stage and that the gross overspend by authorities has fallen. As a result grant holdback is reduced from £12·6 million to £10 million.

The report also makes consequential changes to the calsulation of grant related expenditure.

My Department is sending local authorities copies of the report, and details of their revised grant entitlements.

I propose to lay the first supplementary report for 1985-86 before the House on 9 July.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inward Investment Unit

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many inward investment missions from the inward investment unit of his Department have been carried out to (a) the United States of America, (b) Japan and (c) the continental European Economic Community in the last (i) three years and (ii) five years.

Mr. Trippier: The Invest in Britain bureau in my Department does not carry out inward investment missions to overseas countries. Its main activities are, in consultation with diplomatic service posts and other promotional bodies in the United Kingdom, organising seminars and investment lunches and dinners overseas; dealing with individual prospective investors; United Kingdom coordination of inward investment promotion activities; and publicising overseas the attractiveness of the United Kingdom as a location for investment.

National Audit Office (Documents)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his answer of 20 June, Official Report, column 176, what safeguards exist to ensure that documents stamped "Not for National Audit Office Eyes" fall within the category agreed with the National Audit Office; and when this practice originated.

Mr. Butcher: The internal audit branch of my Department whose reports are sent to the National Audit Office, review compliance with instructions for the correct classifications of such documents. The practice became established very many years ago with the knowledge of the then Exchequer and Audit Department.

Patents Office

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his reply of 25 February, Official Report, column 10, about changing the status of the Patents Office, what provisos on the implementation of any change in status were specified by the 10 respondents; and what constituted necessity in the view of 30 respondents.

Mr. Butcher: Ten of the respondents who favoured changing the status of the Patents Office did so provided that Patents Office fees were not substantially increased as a result of the change and/or that acceptable arrangements were adopted regarding the powers to be delegated to the office and regarding the constitution of its management board. Thirty respondents were prepared to accept a change of status if this were necessary to enable the office to respond better to user needs for new and improved services.

Lead Development Association (Exhibition)

Mr. Brinton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the Lead Development Association to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. Arrangements have been made for such an exhibition in the Upper Waiting Hall to take place from 15 July 1985 to 21 July 1985.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sri Lankan Nationals

6. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now withdraw the visa requirement for Sri Lankan nationals.

Mr. Brittan: No.

21. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to review the policy of requiring visas for Sri Lankan nationals wishing to travel from Sri Lanka to Britain.

Mr. Waddington: The policy is being kept under review but my right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to withdraw the visa requirement for Sri Lankan citizens at present.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Sri Lankan citizens, who are permanently resident in Britain, now have to obtain a re-entry visa if they wish to visit an overseas country; what regulations apply to citizens of other Commonwealth countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: All Sri Lankan citizens, except those who were settled in the United Kingdom at the coming into force of the Immigration Act 1971 and who qualify for readmission under paragraph 56 of the immigration rules (HC 169) require entry or re-entry visas. Citizens of no other Commonwealth country are subject to a general visa requirement, but depending on the purpose for which he is seeking entry a Commonwealth citizen may be required to obtain prior entry clearance in the form of an entry certificate.

Tamils

14. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Tamils have now arrived in the United Kingdom since 20 April; and how many have since been removed to Colombo.

Mr. Waddington: Figures are readily available only from the beginning of May. Since then, some 1,345 Sri Lankan Tamils have arrived at United Kingdom ports and applied for asylum; one has so far been removed to Colombo.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Tamils who sought refuge in the United Kingdom during May are still in detention; why such Tamils were placed in detention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: No Sri Lankan Tamil who sought asylum upon arrival in the United Kingdom during the month of May is now detained. A passenger seeking asylum on arrival is not normally detained pending resolution of his application unless he has no alternative accommodation or the immigration officer considers that he will not comply with such conditions of temporary admission as may be imposed upon him.

Wandsworth Prison

16. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on conditions in Wandsworth prison.

Mr. Mellor: Wandsworth shares the shortcomings, especially in sanitary provision, of Victorian prisons that have not been refurbished. It is, however, less overcrowded than most such prisons; its certified normal accommodation is 1,258 and on 29 June its population was 1,554.

Immigration Rules

18. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give an undertaking to publish draft immigration rules before major changes are introduced.

24. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give an undertaking to publish draft immigration rules before major changes are introduced.

Mr. Waddington: No.

Public Order White Paper

19. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has had on his White Paper on public order.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received comments from a wide range of organisations and individuals; and a number of other organisations have indicated an intention to comment in the near future. Following is a list of those organisations which have commented to date:

The Anti-Aparheid Movement, the Association of British Insurers, the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Association of County Councils, the Association of District Councils, the City of Cardiff, the City of Coventry, the City of London Police Committee, the Engineering Employers' Federation, the Football Leagues, the Greater Manchester Council, the Guild of British Newspaper Editors, JUSTICE, the Legal Action Group, the London Borough of Camden, the London Borough of Croydon, the London Borough of Southwark, the Liverpool 8 Law Centre, the Magistrates' Association, the National Association of Probation Officers, the National Union of Public Employees, the Organisation of Private Tenants, the Police Federation, the Society of Civil and Public Servants, and the Society for Distributing Hebrew Scriptures. In Scotland comments have been received from the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents, the Department of Public Law at Aberdeen University and the Scottish Police Federation.

Young Offenders

20. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the effectiveness of the short, sharp shock treatment on young offenders.

Mr. Mellor: The aim of the new detention centre regime is to be brisk, purposeful and properly geared to the short sentences involved, without either softness or brutality. I believe that this objective is being achieved.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what were the numbers of young people aged (a) 10 to 14 years, (b) 14 to 17 years and (c) 17 to 21 years, respectively, sentenced or apprehended for indictable offences in Wales in the last year for which figures are available; and how these figures compare with those for 1980, 1975 and 1970, respectively;

(2) if he will give, for each county in England, the numbers of young people aged (a) 10 to 14 years, (b) 14 to 17 years and (c) 17 to 21 years, respectively, sentenced or apprehended for indictable offences in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will compare those figures with those for 1980, 1975 and 1970 respectively;

(3) if he will give, for each county in Wales, the numbers of young people aged (a) 10 to 14 years, (b) 14 to 17 years and (c) 17 to 21 years, respectively, sentenced or apprehended for indictable offences in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will compare those figures with those for 1980, 1975 and 1970, respectively;

(4). what were the numbers of young people aged (a) 10 to 14 years, (b) 14 to 17 years and (c) 17 to 21 years, respectively, sentenced or apprehended for indictable offences in England in the last year for which figures are available; and how these figures compare with those for 1980, 1975 and 1970, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information is published, for the latest year for which figures are available, in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, 1983", vol 3, in tables S3.3(B)—(D) for magistrates' courts and tables S3.5(b)—(D) for the Crown court; and in the corresponding supplementary tables for 1980 and supplementary statistics for 1970. Less detailed information is available for 1975 and is given in tables X and XII of the Command Paper for that year (Cmnd 6566).

Prohibited Drugs

22. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent steps he has taken to combat the importation of prohibited drugs.

Mr. Mellor: The Government have taken a number of measures to curb the illicit importation of drugs. Most recently, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the appointment of 50 more customs specialist drugs investigators.

Metropolitan Police (Expenditure)

23. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what extent he considered recent crime statistics for London when fixing the cash limit on the expenditure of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend naturally has regard to statistical trends in recorded crime when determining what resources should be made available to the Metropolitan police, but there is no precise or automatic correlation between the two. The first priority in tackling crime is to ensure taht the considerable resources already made available to the police service by this Government are used to best advantage and that methods of prevention and detection are as effective as they can be made. A solution does not simply or necessarily lie in the provision of further resources.

Sex Discrimination

25. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government policy following the recent judgment by the European Court of Human Rights on sex discrimination.

26. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government policy following the recent judgment by the European Court of Human Rights on sex discrimination.

Mr. Waddington: The Government are urgently reviewing the options for amending the immigration rules to comply with the court's judgment and will announce its decision as soon as possible.

Crime

27. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which recent measures have been most successful in reducing crime.

Mr. Mellor: We are taking action on a number of fronts, and it is difficult to relate changes in the level of crime to particular measures. But some of the crime prevention schemes which have been mounted locally with our encouragement have led to demonstrable reductions in the local incidence of crimes such as burglary.

35. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reduction in recorded crime he estimates can be attributed to recent new Government policies.

Mr. Mellor: In order to make such an assessment it would be necessary to estimate what the general level of recorded crime would have been if a particular policy had not been followed. There is no way of doing so reliably.

28. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest trends in the crime rates.

Mr. Mellor: Recorded crime in England and Wales in the first quarter of 1985 was 3 per cent. higher than in the same quarter last year. Though any increase is unwelcome, this was a lower increase over the corresponding period of the previous year than in any recent quarter, and within the total there was a reduction of about 3 per cent. in the number of burglaries recorded.

Civil Defence Inspectorate

29. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to establish a civil defence inspectorate.

33. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to re-establish the home defence executive or a similar body with the powers of a civil defence inspectorate.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no plans at present; progress by local authorities on implementing the 1983 regulations is being maintained by visits from and meetings and correspondence with the Civil Defence Adviser to the Home Office and other officials. We will keep the need for a formal inspectorate under review.

Police Tactics (Manuals)

30. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to review manuals on police tactics.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Chief officers of police are reviewing the tactics used in public order situations as part of their reviews of police operations during the miners' dispute.

Civil Defence

31. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for a comprehensive civil defence shelter and evacuation policy.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In the unlikely event of a nuclear attack no part of this country could be judged safe from all its effects and there is therefore no certain basis for an evacuation plan. The Government's plans currently rely on the implementation by local authorities of their plans made under the 1983 regulations, including the utilisation of buildings and other structures as public shelters and on people using and improving the protection already offered by their own homes. The matter is under review.

54. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources will be concentrated on planning for survival at community level for civil defence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: All civil defence planning is ultimately directed at the survival of communities and the people within them, and expenditure in the current financial year is expected to be £80 million. Responsibility for planning specifically at the community level rests with the county authorities and the GLC assisted by district and borough authorities and the support available from the co-ordinator of volunteer effort. Total expenditure by local authorities on civil defence planning is expected to be £15 million in the current financial year; a level of expenditure within that total for particular aspects of planning has not been set.

Drug Abuse

32. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his Department's latest measures to combat drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: Government measures to combat drug misuse were set out in "Tackling Drug Misuse: A Summary of the Government's Strategy", which was published in March and a copy of which is in the Library. Subsequent initiatives have included an increase to £11·5 million in DHSS central funding for treatment and rehabilitation projects; the launch of an advertising campaign in England and Wales; the publication of a summary of English health authorities' plans for improving services for drug misuser; a scheme under the education support grant arrangements, costing up to £2 million in 1986-87, to enable each local education authority in England and Wales to appoint an officer to co-ordinate preventive action; and the appointment of 50 more Customs specialist drugs investigators.

Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984

34. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will delay the bringing into force of the sections of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 due to come into force on 1 January 1986 until the 24-hour solicitor scheme is available throughout England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 are not dependent on the prior existence of a 24-hour duty solicitor scheme throughout England and Wales.

London Policemen (Firearms)

36. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has had any discussion with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis concerning the issuing of firearms to policemen in London.

Mr. Brittan: Not in the recent past. But I am satisfied that the arrangements in the Metropolitan police on these matters fully reflect the guidelines issued in March 1983.

Young People (Sentencing Policy)

37. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will set up an inquiry into sentencing policy for young people.

Mr. Mellor: No. The Criminal Justice Act 1982 introduced a new sentencing structure for young offenders, whose effects we are monitoring closely; but my right hon. and learned Friend has no further plans for major change in this area.

Railway Vandalism (Parental Responsibility)

38. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to introduce legislation to ensure parental responsibility for children who throw objects on trains and railway tracks in use.

Mr. Mellor: In the Criminal Justice Act 1982 we strengthened the courts' powers to bring home to parents their responsibilities by ordering them to pay fines, compensation or costs imposed on children under 17. We have no plans for further legislation on this point.

Alcohol Sales (Supermarkets)

39. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied with the working of the present law regulating the sale of alcohol in supermarkets, particularly in respect of young people.

Mr. Mellor: Supermarkets with off-licences are subject to the licensing law in the same way as other off-licensed premises. Breaches of that law are a matter for the police and it is open to them or to any other person to oppose the annual renewal of a licence. I am not aware of any evidence to suggest that the operation of the present law at supermarkets causes particular problems.

Temporary Parole (Statistics)

40. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give statistics for the last five years for those prisoners given temporary parole within one year of the end of their sentences who failed to report back to prison.

Mr. Mellor: Information in respect of 1984 is not yet available. The information which is available is as follows:

Year	*No. of occasions when home leave and pre-parole leave granted	No. of prisoners reported as failing to return†
1979	5,383	297
1980	5,465	290
1981	5,222	285
1982	5,208	206
1983	4,893	194

* Excludes youth custody centres, borstals and detention centres.
† Many of those reported as failing to return will have returned late.

Crime Prevention

41. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest steps he is taking to improve crime prevention.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Under the aegis of the Home Office standing conference on crime prevention working groups have been established to devise preventive measures against residential burglary; for improving car security; and to take forward the revision of guidelines for crime prevention panels. Reports of the working groups will be presented in November. A joint Home Office/Association of Chief Police Offices working party is carrying out a review of police crime prevention training needs and the role of the Home Office crime prevention centre. The Home Office crime prevention unit has a range of research projects in hand. The unit's report on property marking in south Wales, published last month, demonstrates how domestic burglarly can be reduced significantly; that project continues.

46. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to announce further measures to combat the increase in recorded crime.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today to a question from the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd).

Special Constables

42. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate how many special constables will be serving in the United Kingdom during 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Recruitment to the special constabulary is the responsibility of chief officers of police. There were 16,012 special constables in forces in England and Wales on 31 December 1984.

Police Custody

43. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied with current procedures to prevent deaths in police custody.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes. The consolidated circular to the police on crime and kindred matters provides guidance on the procedures to be followed in cases where a detained person appears to be ill or physically unfit, or to present special risk.

Hooliganism

44. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has considered the reintroduction of conscription as a means of reducing football and other forms of hooliganism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In her statement to the House on 3 June my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister set out the measures which are being taken to deal with football hooliganism, including the introduction of legislation to control the possession of alcohol at, or on the way to, football matches. We do not regard the reintroduction of conscription as being an appropriate way of dealing with this problem.

Metropolitan Police (Expenditure)

45. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he receives independent of the Metropolitan police when he reviews its budget submissions; and by how much he reduced its submission for 1985-86.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend receives advice from the Department. He also has regard to views expressed by right hon. and hon. Members from time to time and by the local authority associations concerned at their regular November meeting on the estimates with the receiver for the Metropolitan police district.

The Metropolitan police estimates for 1985-86, which he approved in February, were prepared by the receiver within limits set by him earlier in the financial cycle.

Concessionary Television Licences

47. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to change the system of concessionary television licensing.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply gives to his question on 28 March at column 269.

Defendants (Compensation)

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will introduce legislation to establish a compensation scheme for defendants who are remanded in custody and subsequently acquitted.

Mr. Mellor: The question in what cases compensation should be paid out of public funds to defendants acquitted at trial is within the scope of the current review of arrangements for compensation in this field. My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to be in a position to announce our conclusions later this year.

European Convention on Human Rights

49. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to announce the Government's decision about how they intend to comply with the European convention on human rights in respect of husbands and fiancés.

Mr. Waddington: As soon as possible.

Victim Support Schemes

50. Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of central Government spending on law and order services is spent on funding victim support schemes.

Mr. David Mellor: Total estimated central Government expenditure on law and order services in England and Wales during the current financial year will be £1,087 million. The Department is making a grant to the National Association of Victims Support Schemes of up to £120,000, which represents approximately 0·01 per cent. of this total; and some £37 million (or 3·4 per cent. will be spent on compensating victims through the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme. In addition, an unquantifiable proportion of police resources is devoted to assisting the victims of crime.

Some local victims support schemes receive grants through the Manpower Services Commission, the Urban Programme and the DHSS "Opportunities for Volunteering" scheme, but such payments are not included in calculations of expenditure on law and order.

Identity Cards

51. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to introduce identity cards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

Licensing Laws

52. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received following the publication of the preliminary report of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys' study of drinking in Scotland on the implications for policy on licensing laws in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox).

Football Ground Safety

53. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in relation to football grounds, he will take steps to ensure that, where wooden stands exist on the terraces, these areas should be no smoking areas.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The extent to which restrictions on smoking might contribute to safety against fire risks in football stadia is a matter within the terms of reference of the Popplewell committee of inquiry and I will arrange for the hon. Member's suggestion to be brought to the committee's attention.

European Court of Human Rights (Immigration Rules)

55. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received about the decision of the European Court of Human Rights on Her Majesty's Government's immigration rules; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: We had received at 2 July about 125 written representations arising out of the Court's decision the great majority in favour of maintaining firm immigration control. The Government are urgently reviewing the options for amending the immigration rules to comply with the court's judgment and will announce their decision as soon as possible.

Holloway Prison

56. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to publish the report on facilities in Holloway prison.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to questions from the hon. Members for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on 13 June at column 501.

Drug Squad Duties

57. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers are now wholly engaged in drug squad duties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Figures for the strength of force drug squads in England and Wales as at 1 January 1985 were provided in the reply given to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 21 June at columns 395-96.

Popplewell Report (Football Grounds)

58. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has yet received Mr. Justice Popplewell's report on incidents at football grounds.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We hope to receive an interim report from Mr. Justice Popplewell during July, dealing mainly with the events at Bradford City and Birmingham football grounds on 11 May. Thereafter he will proceed with his final report as soon as possible.

Drug Trafficking

59. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has had about the measures currently being taken to inhibit drug trafficking.

Mr. Mellor: We have received a number of letters expressing concern about drug trafficking and drug misuse. In reply we have emphasised the priority which the Government attaches to this problem and the range of measures which we have taken, including the provision this year of 160 new permanent Customs preventive posts and 50 more Customs specialist drugs investigators.

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the numbers of persons charged with offences relating to drug trafficking in the Yorkshire and Humberside region during the past five years; and if he will break down this figure into areas within the Yorkshire and Humberside region.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is given in the following table. Corresponding figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Persons proceeded against in the Yorkshire and Humberside region for trafficking in controlled drugs*

Police force area	1980	1981	1982	1983
Humberside	10	22	20	11
North Yorkshire	8	20	10	16
South Yorkshire	14	24	43	27
West Yorkshire	63	60	66	78
Total	95	126	139	132

* Offences of unlawful production of drugs other than cannibis, unlawful supply, possession with intent to supply unlawfully and unlawful import or export.

Heathrow (Jokes)

60. Mr. Ian Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to on whose authority a statement was issued by chief inspector Jim Hunt that travellers making jocular remarks about the security procedures at Heathrow would be arrested, charged and brought before the court; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that in the course of a regular weekly briefing of the local press, the chief inspector in charge of operations at Heathrow airport, acting with the full authority of the commander of airport district, drew attention to the serious difficulties caused to airport staff and public by a sharp increase recently in the number of calls on the police to deal with suspected bombs. This has included a number of incidents where passengers handing in luggage for screening have claimed that it contained a bomb. Such highly irresponsible acts cause considerable alarm and distress to staff and public and, against the background of recent terrorist activity, all such incidents have to be checked out by the police. In view of this the chief inspector indicated that the police would, in appropriate cases, consider taking action against those making such claims.

It is an offence under section 51(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1977 for a person to communicate any information which he knows or believes to be false to another person with the intention of inducing in him or any other person a false belief that a bomb or other thing liable to explode or ignite is present in any place or location whatever.

Frankland Prison

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the cost of installing a Zuckermann wood-working machine at Frankland prison;

(2) whether the Zuckermann wood-working machine at Frankland prison has ever been used;

(3) what assessment he has made of the cost of moving the Zuckermann wood-working machine out of Frankland prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mellor: The machine was purchased in 1980 at a cost of £144,000. Additional costs of £6,000 were incurred in installing it. The cost of moving the machine, which has been used only for trial periods, would be in the region of £2,000. It is now clear that the machine cannot be used effectively in prison industries and that the decision to purchase it was based on an error of judgment about the market for furniture assembly work carried out in prisons. The machine has been offered for sale by tender.

Financial and managerial performance in prison industries should be improved by the changes in control, managment and polices which my right hon. and learned Friend announced on 31 October at column 987.

Trials (Statistics)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in 1983 and 1984, respectively, who were proceeded against in all courts were not subsequently convicted; and what percentage of the total number of people proceeded against this represented.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, 1983", vol. 1, table S1.1(A)—magistrates' courts and vol. 2, table S2.1(A) — the Crown court. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Privacy

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will deposit in the Library copies of all the papers prepared for the forthcoming Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development intergovernmental meeting on privacy.

Mr. Waddington: All but two of the papers presented to the meeting remain, for the time being, internal to the OECD. I am arranging to deposit those two—a paper on freedom of information and one by the trade union advisory committee—in the Library.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government will press for all future meetings of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development intergovernmental meetings on privacy to be open on an observer basis to the accredited representatives of responsible and interested international bodies, including the International Organisation of Consumer Unions.

Mr. Waddington: The OECD has clear rules which limit the attendance of non-governmental bodies at its meetings. The business and industry advisory committee and the trade union advisory committee are, however, regularly invited to exchange views with OECD committees, and bodies seeking direct access to committee meetings are best advised to work through BIAC or through TUAC. The meeting on privacy held in Paris on 26 and 27 June was a routine one to review the implementation in member states of the OECD guidelines on data protection. I understand that no further meeting of the privacy group is planned for at least 18 months.

Political Asylum

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many foreign nationals have successfully appealed against the initial refusal of political asylum in each year since 1979;

(2) what, since 1979, has been the average time between the refusal of an application for political asylum in the United Kingdom and the end of appeal proceedings;

(3) what, since 1979, has been (a) the shortest and (b) the longest time between a refusal of an application for political asylum in the United Kingdom and the end of appeal proceedings.

Mr. Waddington: I understand from the appellate authorities that no separate records of asylum appeals are maintained; the information requested is therefore not available.

Prison Population

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department by how many people the prison population has changed since Easter; and what was the figure for the same period after Easter in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The increase or decrease in the prison population between Good Friday and the last Friday in June has been as follows:

Year	Increase or decrease	Number of weeks
1982	−113	*11
1983	†−695	12
1984	−214	10
1985	+1,737	12

* In 1982 population figures for Good Friday were not recorded centrally; figures for the previous Friday are used instead.

† During May 1983 there was a fall of about 1,000 in the number of young offenders in the prison population following implementation of Part 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has made contingency plans to relieve overcrowding in prisons in the event that the rate at which the prisons building programme is implemented proves inadequate to cope with the increase in the prison population; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We naturally keep the adequacy of the prison building programme under review.

Wayland Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current population of Wayland prison.

Mr. Mellor: Four hundred and seventy-five on 28 June.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provision exists for workshops at Wayland prison.

Mr. Mellor: Wayland prison has a workshop block of 8,100 square metres which will provide 281 workplaces for prisoners as follows:

	Workplaces Industries
Laundry	35
Tailoring	120
Farms and Gardens Machinery Repair	30
Vocational Training
Welding	24
Motor Mechanics	12
Light Bodied Vehicle Repair	12
Industrial Cleaning	12
Construction Industry Training
Painting and Decorating	12
Electrical Installation	12
Bricklaying	12

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners participated in workshops at Wayland prison in the most recent convenient week; and what was their average working week.

Mr. Mellor: There were 21 prisoners employed in the laundry at Wayland prison in the week ending 23 June 1985. The average working week was 25·3 hours. About six prisoners were also employed in assembling racking in the tailoring workship, which is not yet in operation.

Prisons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans for the refurbishment of cells in local prisons have been cancelled or deferred since the beginning of 1985.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Crime Statistics

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of crimes in England and Wales involving sex or violence in each of the last five years in which pornography was found to be a contributory factor.

Mr. Mellor: The available information on offences of violence against the person and sexual offences recorded by the police is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (Tables 2.8 and 2.9 of the issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9349). Information is not collected centrally on whether pornography might have been involved.

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of convictions in England and Wales in each of the five years for producing, publishing or distributing obscene material or for conducting obscene exhibitions.

Mr. Mellor: The information available to me, which may be incomplete, is published annually under offence classification 86 in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" — in Vol. 1, Table S1.1(A) for magistrates' courts and Vol. 2, Table S2.1(A) for the Crown Court. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Drug Addicts

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many known class A drug addicts there were in England and Wales in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively; and if he will break the information down by county;

(2) how many known class A drug addicts there were in Scotland in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively; and if he will break the information down by county.

Mr. Mellor: The available information on narcotic drug addicts notified to the Home Office relates to police force areas and is given, for the years 1980-83, in Tables 3.11 — 3.13 of "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs, United Kingdom, Supplementary Tables 1983". Provisional figures for new addicts notified in 1984 by police force area were given in the reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 11 June 1985 at columns 394-395.

Black People (Wilmslow)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Cheshire police about his policy concerning questioning of black people in Wilmslow.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am informed that the chief constable of Cheshire's policy concerning the questioning of members of the public is to treat every person of whatever race or creed with courtesy and understanding.

Police (Discipline)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each year since 1979 the number of appeals from police disciplinary hearings he received, the number of such appeals he referred to an appeal tribunal under the 1975 criteria, the number he referred to an appeal tribunal other than under the 1975 criteria, the number dealt with other than by reference to an appeal tribunal, the total and percentage where the original finding was upheld, where the original finding was reversed, where the original punishment was upheld and where the original punishment was reversed, respectively.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give for each year since 1979 the number of charges laid under the Police Discipline Regulations in England and Wales arising from a complaint under section 49 of the Police Act and the number arising other than from such complaints, giving also the number of charges proved in each category.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of offences charged in England and Wales under the police discipline regulations in respect of matters arising from complaints under section 49 of the Police Act 1964 and otherwise, together with the numbers proved are as follows:

	Arising directly out of Section 49 complaints		In other circumstances
	Total	Proved	Total	Proved
1979	233	164	1,283	1,143
1980	235	198	1,085	1,017
1981	231	183	1,220	1,120
1982	301	240	1,330	1,215
1983	258	197	1,236	1,120
1984	190	140	1,122	1,029

Mr. Frank Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for each year since 1979, how many Metropolitan police officers have (a) resigned after disciplinary charges have been preferred but before proceedings were completed, (b) resigned while under investigation for disciplinary matters and (c) were under suspension at the time of their resignation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information is included in the section on discipline in Chapter 2 (Personnel and Training) of the annual reports of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis but for convenience I summarise it as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Resigned after disciplinary charge had been preferred but before proceedings completed	10	10	10	8	15	5
Resigned while under investigation for disciplinary matters	42	22	22	29	26	30
Under suspension at the time of resignation	12	11	12	12	10	4

Mr. Peter Pickering

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his policy towards the case of Mr. Peter Pickering, a patient at Park Lane hospital, Merseyside, remains as stated in the Official Report on 9 April, columns 61-62.

Mr. Mellor: Yes, my right hon. and learned Friend and I continue to take the firm view that Mr. Pickering is not fit for release into the community.

Community Service

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what totals have been allocated to the community service budget for each of the years since 1979; and what proportion this represents of probation service expenditure.

Mr. Mellor: The allocation of resources to community service schemes is a matter for each area probation committee, and the information requested is not available centrally. Total local authority expenditure on the probation service has risen from £74 million in 1979-80 to an estimated £167 million in 1985-86, and a significant proportion of the real growth is due to the increasing use of the community service order. The number of ancillary workers, who are the staff mostly used to run community service schemes, rose over the same period rom 807 to 1,335, compared with a rise of 4,810 to 5,590 in the number of probation officers.

Stonehenge (Disturbances)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were (a) arrested and (b) charged in connection with grant disturbances at and near to Stonehenge; and the grounds of arrest and the nature of the charges; how many police officers and other were injured; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 14 June 1985, c. 570]: I understand from the latest information available to the chief constable that, of the 482 arrests on 1 June 1985 and 161 arrests on other days between 31 May and 27 June the following action has so far been taken.

	Number
Charged	495
Not released:
Released on police bail	77
Other*	71
Total arrested	643

*Includes 23 charge refused
32 cautioned
2 warrant for arrest
14 result not known

The majority of charges are for public order offences; other charges include possession of controlled drugs, theft, criminal damage and assault. In the police operation on 1 June, 15 police officers and 16 others were reported injured though none seriously.

Immigration

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for entry clearance from (a) wives and children and (b) husbands and fiances were referred/deferred for inquiries at each post of the Indian Sub-continent for each year since 1977.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to the reply, 25 June 1985, c. 344-45]: The information requested is given in the following table:

*Applications for entry clearance referred or deferred in the Indian Sub-continent

	Number of persons
	Bombay	Delhi	Calcutta	Madras	Islamabad	Karachi	Dhaka	Total
Wives and children
1977	560	730	90	70	5,940	520	4,720	12,630

Racial Discrimination

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many employers were prosecuted for discrimination under the Race Relations Act (a) between 1976 and 1979 and (b) between 1979 and 1984;

(2) how many employers were prosecuted under the Sex Discrimination Act (a) between 1975 and 1979 and (b) between 1979 and 1985.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1985, c. 12]: Under both the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976 complaints alleging unlawful discrimination in employment are dealt with under the civil law by applications to industrial tribunals. The available information about such applications is as follows:

Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (Source: Ninth Annual Report of the Equal Opportunities Commission 1984)

	Applications made to Industrial Tribunals	Cases heard
1 January 1976 to 31 December 1979	821	322
1 January 1980 to 30 December 1984	1,067	419
Race Relations Act 1976 (Source: Department of Employment Gazette)
13 June 1977÷ to 30 June 1979	510	254
1 July 1979 to 30 June 1981	*758	340
1 January 1981 to 31 December 1984	*936	425

* From 1981, statistics have been collected in calendar years and there is therefore some double counting of the figures for the first half of that year.
÷ Date on which Act came into force.

The figures do not separately identify a small number of applications to tribunals in which the respondent is not an employer, (but is, for example, an employment agency, a vocational training body or a trade union).

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Illegal Fishing

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many persons have been proceeded against for offences relating to illegal fishing at sea in each of the past five years; of what nationality these persons were; and what was the average penalty imposed.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Zimbabwe (Beef Quota)

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what offer has been made by the EEC to Zimbabwe in relation to beef quota.

Mr. Jopling: When in 1980 Zimbabwe acceded to the Lomé convention between the European Community and the African, Caribbean and Pacific States, she secured agreement to supply an annual quota of 8,100 tonnes of beef to the Community on the same concessionary basis as that already granted to other signatories. This provision remains part of the recently agreed Lomé III arrangements. Due to outbreaks of foot and mouth disease, however,

Zimbabwe has been unable to secure the veterinary clearance necessary for exports to the Community to take place. Commission veterinarians have recently visited Zimbabwe and, subject to veterinary clearance being granted, exports may shortly be permitted to commence.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hospital Beds

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of National Health Service beds in the London borough of Wandsworth on 31 May, and the corresponding number on 1 July 1979.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available centrally on bed figures for the London borough of Wandsworth as its boundaries are not conterminous with those of the two district health authorities which serve the area — Wandsworth and Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton.

The average daily number of available beds in Wandsworth health authority in 1984 was 2,534 (provisional) and the comparable figure for 1979 was 2,871. The number of inpatient cases treated per available bed rose from 15·2 in 1979 to 18·1 (provisional) in 1984.

Diet and Laundry Allowances

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many supplementary benefit claimants in Lancashire are receiving (a) special diet allowance and (b) special laundry allowance.

Mr. Whitney: Information on special diet allowance and special laundry allowance is not available separately for claimants in Lancashire. Available information on claimants receiving these additions nationally in December 1983 is as follows:

	Number (Thousands)
Special Diet Allowance	445
Special Laundry Allowance	121

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry 1983.

Doctors (Pay)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he proposes to take any action on the structure of general practitioners' remuneration following the recent recommendations of the report of the Royal College of General Practitioners on a pay-incentive scheme for general practitioners, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We welcome this constructive contribution to public discussion about future arrangements for general practice. I have invited representatives of the Royal College to discuss its consultation document with me later this month, including the proposal for a closer link between remuneration and performance. We are not yet ready to make any firm proposals for changes in the structure of general practitioners' remuneration.

Outpatient Waiting Lists

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the present average length of waiting lists for hospital outpatient appointments; and how this compares with the figure for each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not at present collected centrally. The Health Services Information Steering Group has, however, recommended in its first report a new annual district return to be submitted centrally to record, by specialty, the number of patients waiting for an outpatient appointment. Health authorities have been asked to plan on the basis that the steering group's first report will be implemented by April 1987.

Notifiable Diseases

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that, when notifiable diseases are reported, a record is made of whether or not they have arisen in hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The notification form, a copy of which I am sending to the right hon. Member, already has provision for the recording of this information.

Hospitals (Infection)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to estimate the cost of hospital acquired infection.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans to do so.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer of 24 June, Official Report, columns 337-8, if he will publish on a regional basis such information as is collected centrally about funding arrangements for transfer of mentally handicapped people from hospitals to the community.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I regret that my earlier reply to the hon. Member contained, when printed, a typing error in the first sentence. The reply that I drafted stated:

"We do expect funds to transfer when responsibility for services for mentally handicapped people transfers from one authority to another."

We expect authorities to make financial provision to support the local developments they propose, and to take account of all the services required when drawing up their plans. We look for evidence that this is happening when we scrutinise review papers, plans and programmes. I am not convinced that production of a centrally compiled account of funding arrangements within individual regions would be helpful without an equally detailed account of the service developments proposed. But I shall bear the hon. Member's suggestion in mind.

Leukaemia

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has had in respect of making lymphema leukaemia a condition specified for exemption from prescription charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since 1 January 1985 we have received one letter from an hon. Member and one letter from a member of the public about exempting people who suffer with leukaemia from prescription charges. We have not received any representations on behalf of people who suffer from lymphema leukaemia.

Single Payments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments were awarded by appeal tribunals in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively; and what was the average payment.

Mr. Whitney: The number of appeals relating to claims for single payments is as follows:

Great Britain

Year	Number of appeals heard	Number of successful appeals
1981	21,453	4,879
1982	26,269	5,723
1983	29,691	7,036
*†1984	8,706	2,068

* 1 January 1984 to 31 March 1984.

†*As a result of recent industrial action within the Department annual statistics for 1984 are not yet available.

Information regarding the average amount of single payments awarded by appeal tribunals is not available.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average length of time taken to dispose of appeals for single payments in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: Separate information on appeals for single payments is not available. The average length of time from lodgement of an appeal to initial hearing for all supplementary benefit appeals heard in Great Britain is as follows:

	Weeks
1981	6·8
1982	8·5
1983	9·4
*1984	10·5

* As a result of recent industrial action within the Department this figure is only for the first quarter.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of administering appeals relating to single payments taking one week and each additional week to the maximum time taken to settle appeals in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not available. A costing exercise last year estimated that £10·855 million was spent on supplementary benefit appeals work in 1983; this sum includes the cost of work on the 82,212 appeals lodged but resolved without a tribunal hearing, as well as the 60,567 appeals actually heard.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments were made for maternity needs and for a new baby's needs in each year from 1981 to 1984; what is the average level of payment; and what is the average combined level of payment to each claimant.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested on the maternity needs of new born or recently adopted children is:

	No. of single payments (to nearest thousand)*	Average level of payment
1981	61,000	£43·35
1982	101,000	£53·61
1983	142,000	£59·91

* Figures are from the Annual Statistical Enquiry and relate to single payments made during the 12 months preceding the date of the enquiry to persons still in receipt of supplementary benefit at the time of the enquiry, and do not, therefore, record all the single payments made during the year.

Payments to the mother to meet her own maternity needs for clothing and footwear are made under regulation 27 of the Supplementary Benefits (Single Payment) Regulations. That regulation also covers payments for clothing and footwear made for other reasons and no separate figures are available for the mothers' own maternity needs.

St. George's Hospital

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to seek to ensure that the former St. George's hospital, Hyde Park Corner, does not fall into further disrepair.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Temporary remedial work has been carried out following damage caused partly by the bad weather earlier this year. We will keep the need for further work under review and seek to ensure that this historic building does not deteriorate further. Twenty-four hour security is being maintained to combat possible vandalism.

I am glad to say that lawyers are well advanced with work to bring to contract an agreement I have reached with the Grosvenor estate for the sale of our Department's interest in the site, following which I understand that the estate will be in a position to give effect to its plans to redevelop the site, including restoration of the Wilkins building.

Social Fund

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how the proposed social fund will cater for the needs of the terminally ill; and whether help from the proposed social fund will be by way of grant or only by loan.

Mr. Newton: We shall consider the range of circumstances where a payment might be made from the social fund to income support recipients to promote commmunity care, including cases where someone is terminally ill. Normally community care payments would be given as grants.

East Cumbria (Health Authority)

Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the members of the East Cumbria area health authority; by whom they are nominated; and what is the period of their term of office.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally. The responsibility for appointing members of East Cumbria health authority lies with Northern regional health authority and the appropriate local authorities. The hon. Member may therefore wish to obtain the information from the chairman of the regional health authority.

Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what correspondence he has had with the East Cumbria area health authority regarding the privatising of domestic services in the hospitals in the area.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: East Cumbria health authority has received our circular on competitive tendering for domestic, catering and laundry services together with other related general communications. We have not corresponded with this health authority individually on this subject.

Drug Addiction

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent report he has received about the increase in drug addiction in the east midlands; whether he intends to make available additional funds to increase the number of beds in the unit to treat addiction in the east midlands; whether he will also provide funds to provide additional units elsewhere than Nottingham, and to increase facilities in addition for after-care and for family support; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Information from health authorities covering the east midlands has been published in "Drug Misuse: Prevalence and Service Provision" (DHSS, June 1985), a copy of which is in the Library. It is for health authorities, in consultation with other service providers, to determine the level of provision for the treatment and follow up of drug misusers in their areas. Health authorities were invited to submit applications for central funding where they considered increased provision for drug misusers was necessary and central funding has recently enabled the Mapperley unit in Nottingham to open an outpatient and community centre. The Mapperley unit provides a specialist service for six districts. Applications under the initiative for funding of a counselling service in south Derbyshire and a community drug team in Leicestershire are being considered.

Child Abuse

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he proposes to issue a consultative paper setting out new guidelines on the role of local authorities in detecting and handling child abuse cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: [pursuant to his reply, 3 July 1985]: I have today placed in the Library copies of a consultative paper which outlined the follow-up action to be taken where serious child abuse has occurred. Such cases are very distressing for all those concerned with the care of the child. A great deal of care is and must be taken by people who face the conflicting demands of the need for children to be with their parents and the need to protect some children from the minority of parents who may harm them.

All cases that do occur must be thoroughly investigated. The most immediate need is for management locally quickly to review its services to the family and the paper suggests joint action between the authorities concerned. This should not be delayed until any criminal proceedings are concluded. Follow-up action is equally important to assess the wider implications coming out of the review. We expect the authorities involved to inform the public of the outcome of this action. Subsequently, authorities will be able to describe to the court, if necessary, the action they have taken in terms both of inquiries and of changes to procedures and services.

In most instances, further inquiries will then be unnecessary. There will, however, be a few cases where the authorities consider a further review, involving people from outside their areas, would be appropriate.

The paper describes the arrangements which might be appropriate for such independent inquiries and suggests that, where the initial reviews have been properly carried out and the outcome published, the subsequent inquiries would normally be in private, although public inquiries are not ruled out. Whichever course is chosen, a report of the inquiry should be published.

Comments on the consultative paper are invited by November 1985.

SCOTLAND

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the level of increase in unemployment in the Bathgate travel-to-work area and his talks on this matter with West Lothian district council.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Between 10 May 1984 and 9 May 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the Bathgate travel-to-work area increased by 341 (from 9,727 to 10,068). No talks on this subject have taken place between Ministers and West Lothian district council, but good progress is being made in implementing the recommendations in the Bathgate working party report.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the percentage number of people under the age of 23 years who are out of work in the employment area of Banff and Buchan.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is not available in the precise form requested. However, information on unemployed claimants in the local authority district of Banff and Buchan is available in the Library by the age categories of under 18, age 18, age 19 and age 20 to 24.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many men, women and young persons were in (a) full-time and (b) part-time employment in the Banff and Buchan employment area in 1979 and in each succeeding year, with the latest available figures for the current year.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In the Banff and Buchan employment area, the estimated numbers of (a) full-time employees were 20,200 in 1978 and 19,900 in 1981 and (b) part-time employees were 5,200 in 1978 and 4,700 in 1981. The information is not available for the other years requested.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures for the number of part-time employees in Scotland by sex and sector in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many (a) men and (b) women under the age of 21 years are unemployed in Scotland now; and how many were unemployed in each of the last five years for which records are available;

(2) how many (a) men and (b) women under the age of 24 years are unemployed in Scotland now; and how many were unemployed in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Younger: Information on unemployment in Scotland is available in the Library for recent years by sex for the age categories under 18, aged 18, aged 19 and aged 20 to 24. However, it is difficult to make a comparison with periods before 1982 because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982 from registrants to claimants.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in Scotland were in employment on 1 June; and how many of these were, respectively, (a) male and (b) female.

Mr. Younger: The seasonally adjusted number of employees in employment in Scotland at December 1984 is estimated to have been 1,935,000; of these, 1,054,000 were male and 881,000 were female. Estimates for later dates are not available.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new entrants to the labour force there have been in each year since 1974; how many new entrants he estimates there will be in the current year and in each year until 1990; and if he will express the new Scottish entrants as a proportion of all entrants to the work force in Great Britain.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Agriculture Industry

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make it his policy that in the future allocation of research and development funds to the agriculture industry, the basic research programmes are related to the needs of the industry and consumers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Our policy is, and will continue to be, directed towards meeting the needs of the industry and consumers.

Scottish Tourist Board

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which items are included under the heading of other trading expenditure in the Scottish Tourist Board's accounts; by how much such expenditure under this heading has increased in the last year; what is the reason for the increase; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Included under this heading are charges and commissions relating to the "Holiday Scotland" scheme. The associated revenue is shown under "other trading income". In addition, this heading includes charges for promotion and publications. In total the expenditure under this heading has increased year on year by £170,000. 1983-84 was the first year of the scheme and for 1984-85 the scheme was expanded and developed to realise its full potential. This is demonstrated by the fact that holidays taken through the scheme in 1984-85 were some 60 per cent. up on the previous year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland by how much expenditure by the Scottish Tourist Board on hospitality and travel has increased over the last year; for what reasons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The figures published in the Scottish Tourist Board's accounts for 1984-85 show that expenditure by the board on hospitality and travel has increased by £57,000 over 1983-84. The board incurred additional travel costs in exercising the new power granted in the Tourism (Overseas Promotion) (Scotland) Act 1984; in undertaking increased marketing activity in the United Kingdom; and in co-ordinating the network of area tourist boards.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland by how much the grant-in-aid to the Scottish Tourist Board has increased for 1985-86; what are the reasons for the increase; what criteria he used in determining the precise amount of the increase; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Grant-in-aid to the Scottish Tourist Board is likely to increase in 1985-86 by some £205,000 over 1984-85. This increase is related to the board's needs. In determining the level of grant-in-aid to the board my right hon. Friend has regard to the net cost of the activities proposed by the board in its annual budget estimates and to the pattern of past expenditure by the board. He also has regard to the competing funding requirements of other programmes within his responsibility.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland to what extent in determining the level of grant-in-aid for the Scottish Tourist Board he takes account of any surplus or deficit on its expenditure for the previous year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Significant deficits of grant-in-aid should not occur. Evidence of any surplus of grant-in-aid made available to the Scottish Tourist Board would form one of the factors which my right hon. Friend would take into account in determining the level of the board's grant-in-aid for the following year. I refer my hon. Friend to my earlier answer to him today.

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the size of the surplus on the Scottish Tourist Board's accounts for 1984-85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Scottish Tourist Board accounts on an accruals basis rather than a cash basis. Within that definition, the operating surplus on the board's accounts for 1984-85 is £39,000. This does not represent free cash funds in the hands of the board but has been deployed in financing movements in fixed and current assets after taking account of movements in liabilities. The total grant-in-aid for 1984-85 has been applied by the board in financing its activities.

Banff and Buchan (Youth Training)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many young persons are at present engaged in youth training schemes in the Banff and Buchan employment area, on the last available figures for the current year.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is not available in the precise form requested. However, on 30 June, the latest date for which information is available, there were 405 young persons participating in the youth training scheme in the jobcentre areas of Banff, Fraserburgh and Peterhead, with a planned provision of 998 places for 1985-86 for the same areas.

Job Creation

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps have been taken to reduce the level of unemployment in the Banff and Buchan employment area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to his question of 26 March, at column 81.

The Government's economic strategy, designed to keep inflation down and provide the conditions in which enterprise can flourish and industry can be competitive, forms the general framework within which more jobs can be created in Banff and Buchan as in the rest of the country. Also, the Government's full range of special employment and training measures continues to be available to people in the Banff and Buchan areas.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new jobs he estimates have been created in Scotland in 1983 and 1984 by (a) incoming firms, (b) Scottish-based firms and (c) new companies.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Comprehensive information on jobs created is not available. In the years 1983 and 1984 respectively, 11,134 and 14,212 new jobs were associated with offers of selective financial assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 for projects in Scotland. Of these totals 5,127 and 7,962 were associated with offers to overseas-owned companies.

Agricultural Research and Development

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made with the review of the organisation and funding of agricultural research and development and advisory services in Scotland.

Mr. MacKay: Comments on the consultation paper "A Strategy for Agricultural Research and Development" prepared by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland are currently being received and considered. A further consultation paper on the advisory services will be issued at a later date.

Dental Services

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of community dental officers per head of population in (a) the Lothian health board area, (b) the Glasgow health board area and (c) the Tayside health board area.

Mr. John MacKay: The whole-time equivalent number of community dental officers per head of population in each of the areas at 30 September 1984 is shown as follows:

Health Board	(Community Dental Officers) Whole-time equivalent per head of population
Lothian	1:12,347
Greater Glasgow	1:19,349
Tayside	1:15,968

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of hospital dentists per head of population in (a) the Lothian health board area, (b) the Glasgow health board area and (c) the Tayside health board area.

Mr. John MacKay: The whole-time equivalent number of hospital dentists per head of population in each of the areas at 30 September 1984 is as follows:

Health Board	*Hospital Dentists
Lothian	1:15072
Greater Glasgow	1:11138
Tayside	1:8843

* Whole-time equivalents per head of population.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of dental therapists in the community dental service per head of population in (a) the Lothian health board area, (b) the Glasgow health board area and (c) the Tayside health board area.

Mr. John MacKay: The whole-time equivalent number of dental therapists in the community dental service per head of population in each of the areas at 30 September 1984 is as follows:

Health Board	*Dental Therapists
Lothian	1:57717
Greater Glasgow	1:244764
Tayside	Nil

* Whole-time equivalent per head of population.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of dental hygienists in (a) the Lothian health board area, (b) the Glasgow health board area and (c) the Tayside health board area.

Mr. John MacKay: The whole-time equivalent number of dental hygienists in each of the areas at 30 September 1984 is as follows:

Health Board	*Dental Hygienists
Lothian	12·4
Greater Glasgow	5·3
Tayside	5·0

* Whole-time equivalent.

Licensing Laws

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has made a calculation of the effect on public expenditure as a whole of more liberal licensing laws.

Mr. Ancram: I have no reason to believe that the more liberal licensing laws introduced by the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 have had any significant effect on public expenditure.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals the Forestry Commission has for further meetings with the Nature Conservancy Council and the countryside commissions to discuss the management guidelines for broadleaved woodlands outlined in the broadleaves in Britain review.

Mr. John MacKay: A further meeting has been arranged for 26 July.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many staff the Forestry Commission will be training in the appreciation of wildlife and landscape conservation in broadleaved woodlands in 1985-86 and 1986-87; how many man-days are proposed; what is the estimated cost of this training; and what assistance the Forestry Commission will be seeking from the Nature Conservancy Council and countryside commissions in respect of this training.

Mr. John MacKay: The need for such training will vary from one area to another and plans will be drawn up as a result of the local discussions to be held under the auspices of the Forestry Commission once the new broadleaves policy is launched. The necessary resources, which cannot be quantified at present, will be devoted to this task through a reallocation of training priorities. The Nature Conservancy Council and the countryside commissions will be involved in the training as appropriate.

Dog Licences

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what income was received from dog licences in Scotland in 1984-85; what was the cost of collection in that year; how many licences were issued; and if he has considered the introduction of a replacement scheme of licensing designed to recover the administrative costs.

Mr. Ancram: Final figures for 1984-85 are not yet available. The estimated income received from dog licences in Scotland was £65,625 and the cost of collection was £249,550. This is based on an estimate of 175,000 licences.

The Government are considering the responses to their consultation paper on the future arrangeements for dog licensing in Great Britain. The result of this consideration will be announced as soon as possible.

Electronics Industry

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many companies in Scotland are operating in the electronic manufacturing sector and how many in the research and development and software sectors; and what information he has as to how many of the electronic manufacturing firms also maintain research and development units in Scotland;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the components of charge such as openings, expansions, contractions and closures, in terms of male and female employment and number of units in the electronic sector since 1979 (a) for Scotland as a whole and (b) for each of the Scottish regions.

Mr. Younger: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many men and women, respectively, were employed in part-time positions in the electronics sector in Scotland in 1979 and in each subsequent year for which records are available.

Mr. Younger: The estimated numbers of employees in part-time employment in the electronics industry in Scotland were 100 males and 1,900 females in 1978 and 200 males and 1,300 females in 1981. Estimates for the other years requested are not available.

North Sea Oil and Gas

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are currently employed in the Scottish oil sector and in subsidiary sectors operating in Scotland; and what were the figures in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Younger: Total employment in firms in Scotland identified by the Manpower Services Commission as being wholly related to North sea oil and gas activity is estimated to have been 60,983 in December 1984. This is the most recent estimate available. The estimates for June of the years 1979 to 1984 are:

June	Thousands	June	Thousands
1979	41·8	1982	58·3
1980	46·3	1983	63·3
1981	49·6	1984	64·0

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of youth training scheme trainees in Scotland in 1984-85 gained full-time jobs on completion of their training.

Mr. Younger: Precise information on the number of youth training scheme trainees subsequently taking up employment is not available. However, the results from the Manpower Services Commission's sample survey of 15 per cent. of young people who left the scheme between July and September 1984 suggest that some 55 per cent. of leavers in Scotland were in full-time employment some three months after leaving the scheme. That survey indicates a further 1 per cent. were in part-time employment, another 5 per cent. entered full-time education or training courses and a further 4 per cent. joined a different youth training scheme. The full results of the sample survey are available in the Library.

Regional Development Grant

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average cost per job created by regional development grants in Scotland in each of the last 10 years for which records are available.

Mr. Younger: Before the commencement of the new scheme in November last year such grants were not linked to jobs. 269 offers of regional development grant under the new scheme totalling £13·5 million in grant have been made in Scotland since 29 November 1984. The number of new jobs promised by these offers was 4,056.

Wages

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average annual wage of (a) full-time and part-time female manual workers in Scotland in 1979 and in each subsequent year for which records are available.

Mr. Younger: The estimates of average weekly earnings of female manual workers in Scotland for April of each year from 1979 to 1984 were published for full-time employees in table 13 of part A of the "New Earnings Survey" reports and for part-time employees in table 180 of part F of the "New Earnings Survey" reports. These volumes have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish (a) a table showing the proportion of full-time employees in Scotland, who, in the "New Earnings Survey 1984", are paid less than £50, £60, £70, £80, £90, £100 and £110 per week, respectively, when overtime earnings are included and (b) a table showing the proportion of full-time employees in the same area who are paid less than £100 and £110 when overtime earnings are excluded, for all males and females and sub-divided into manual and non-manual males and females.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested for full-time employees on adult rates whose pay was not affected by absence is set out in the table.

	Percentage with weekly earnings less than:
	£50	£60	£70	£80	£90	£100	£110

Emigration

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest figure for the numbers who have emigrated from Scotland since 1979; and if he will estimate the numbers who emigrated from Scotland in 1984, or the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. John MacKay: The estimates, covering 1 July to 30 June in each case, are as follows:

Estimated net emigration from Scotland

	thousands
1979-80	16·3
1980-81	23·1
1981-82	14·9
1982-83	17·8
1983-84	9·1

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people he estimates will emigrate from Scotland in the current year and during the next five-year period.

Mr. John MacKay: Retrospective estimates of migration are made when certain data are available, and the estimate for the year to 30 June 1985 has not yet been prepared. Annual estimates of migration for future years are not prepared, but the most recent (1983 based) population projection, designed to illustrate possible levels of population in the longer term future, assumed a net migration loss of 15,000 per annum.

THE ARTS

Export Licences

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will list the items for which the issuing of export licences was withheld on the recommendations of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art during the half year ended 30 June, specifying in each case the valuation and whether an item was eventually exported or retained, with particulars in the latter event of the acquiring institutions; and whether he will list any items for which licences have been withheld but the final disposal of which is not decided, specifying in each case (a) the valuation and (b) the relevant time limit.

Mr. Waldegrave: Details are given in the table. Valuations have been omitted in two cases because of the owners' wishes that these should remain confidential

Allocation

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will specify the allocations made to public institutions in the United Kingdom during the half year ended 30 June of individual works of art and museum objects pre-eminent for national, scientific, historic or artistic interest which have been accepted in satisfaction of capital transfer tax, together with information, where applicable, as to the conditions or wishes expressed in the matter of allocation by testators or executors; and whether he will list the works of art and museum objects which are still awaiting allocation with the respective dates of their acceptance in satisfaction of capital transfer tax.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is as follows:

Item	To whom allocated
1. Items allocated since 1 January 1985
Calke Abbey (house, contents, land)*	National Trust

NATIONAL FINANCE

Industrial Production

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1970 the annual increase in productivity of (a) the whole economy less oil and gas and production industries and (b) manufacturing industry.

Mr. Peter Rees: The available information is as follows:

Football Pools

Mr. Holt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the revenue income from fixed odds football pools in each of the five years from 1960 to 1965 and 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: Fixed odds football pool betting was exempt from duty until 3 August 1964. Revenue in 1964-65 was £3·9 million. From 1980 to 1985 receipts were as follows:

Year	£ thousand
1980-81	36
1981-82	27

Trustee Savings Bank Bill

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Trustee Savings Bank Bill.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes. I asked Sir John Read, the chairman of the Trustee Savings Banks Central Board, to consider the implications of the amendments made at Report Stage in another place on 16 April and to respond to them. I am pleased to say that the TSBs have agreed to make a number of significant changes to their plans to take account of comments which have been made in the other place and elsewhere. Sir John Read has set out these further commitments in a letter to my right hon. Friend which is reproduced below. For their part, the Government will propose appropriate consequential amendments, as necessary, to the Bill.

The Treasury will not exercise its power to initiate the reorganisation provided for in the Bill by making an order appointing the vesting day until it is satisfied that the TSBs have taken the appropriate steps to implement the undertakings which they have given in Sir John Read's letters of 6 December 1984 (reproduced in the White Paper) and 16 May 1985 (reproduced below).

16 May 1985

Rt. Hon. Nigel Lawson, M.P.
Chancellor of the Exchequer,
H.M. Treasury,
Parliament Street,
London, SW1P 3AG.

Dear Chancellor,

1. Since I wrote to you on 6 December 1984, there have been a number of developments in the TSB Group's preparations for the reorganisation and we have agreed to make some changes to our plans in the light of views expressed in Parliament, especially in the House of Lords debate on Report on 16 April 1985. I thought therefore that I should write to you again to put some further points on the record.

TSB Scotland

2. As you know, the Trustee Savings Banks Central Board and the Trustees of Trustee Savings Bank Scotland are unanimously of the view that TSB Scotland can, should and will continue to function as an independently managed Scottish bank within the Group. We are convinced that the future of TSB Scotland will be better assured as a member of the Group than as an entirely separate company without access to the common facilities and resources of the Group. However, we recognise that the fears which have been expressed on this point reflect genuine concerns felt in Scotland.

3. We are therefore glad that the Government has agreed to amend the Bill so as to put it beyond doubt that the four banking companies to which the Bill refers shall be registered, and so have their registered offices, in the territory in which they operate, i.e. England and Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland and the Channel Islands respectively. We understand that the concept of "head office", as opposed to "unregistered office", is not defined in statute; but we undertake that the head office of each of these banks will remain in the country in which it is registered. Once the business of the existing TSBs has been vested in these banking companies, a private Act of Parliament would in practice be required before the separate identity of any of these banks could be removed. Indeed, the need for a private Act will offer a new safeguard to regional and national interests, because under the present system in the Trustee Savings Banks Act 1981 TSBs have power to merge simply by the resolution of three-quarters of the Trustees without any kind of Parliamentary or indeed Government approval.

4. In addition, we are happy to give the assurance that, as appropriate, the articles of association of the new Group holding company and of the successor banking companies within the Group will provide for the following points:—

(i) The Annual General Meeting of TSB Group plc shall be held in Scotland and the registered office of the company shall be based there;

(ii) Each banking company shall have its own board of directors, with a minimum of ten and a maximum of fourteen. The initial boards will be drawn substantially from trustees of the present banks. Thereafter, with the exception of those members referred to in paragraph (iii) below, each board will appoint its own members, subject to the approval of the parent board. The articles will not provide for the parent board to appoint members of the individual banks' boards. Provision will be made for 75 per cent. of the board members to be normally resident in the country or territory of the bank;

(iii) Two members of the Board of each UK banking company shall be appointed by the governors of the TSB charitable foundation for its country or territory, subject to the approval of the bank board but not of the Group board. These two members will be expected to ensure that the interests of the country or territory concerned are fully represented in the board's deliberations;

(iv) The directors of each banking company will be under a responsibility to take into account not only the interests of its shareholders but also the interests of customers and staff, the bank's responsibilities under the Banking Act 1979 and the interests of the country or territory in which the bank is established;

(v) The Chairman of each bank board shall be appointed to the Group board. In addition, the Chief Executive of TSB England and Wales and the Chief Executive of TSB Scotland shall be appointed to the Group board;

(vi) The agreements to be entered into between TSB Group plc and each banking company providing that TSB Group plc will refrain from acting to reduce the net worth of the banking companies and setting out dividend policy in relation to them, shall not be changed without the agreement of two-thirds of the directors of the bank concerned.

5. We confirm that Trustee Savings Bank Scotland plc and Trustee Saving Bank Northern Ireland plc will apply to the Bank of England for separate recognition as banks under the Banking Act 1979. The business of TSB England and Wales will be vested in the present Central Trustee Savings Bank Limited which will change its name to Trustee Savings Bank England and Wales plc. As Central Trustee Savings Bank Limited is already a recognised bank, it will not be necessary for it formally to apply in its new name for recognition. We confirm that it will seek to maintain that status. It will of course follow that the board of each bank will be separately responsible for the direction of its banking business and, like all other banks in the UK, will be supervised by the Bank of England. Trustee Savings Bank Channel Islands Limited will apply for authorisation in the Channel Islands under local legislation.

TSB Charitable Foundations

6. I confirmed in my letter of 6 December 1984 that the TSB Group intended to proceed with the endowment of certain charitable foundations. These proposals have also been the subject of debate in Parliament. We are pleased that, in the light of those debates, you have agreed that the Government will propose an amendment providing for the TSB Central Board to arrange the establishment of charitable foundations and the vesting in them of shares in TSB Group plc. We undertake that the Central Board will establish a charitable foundation for each of England and Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland and the Channel Islands. The Board will ensure that five per cent. of the share capital in TSB Group plc is distributed among these four foundations in proportion to the accumulated reserves of each of the existing TSBs.

7. These charitable foundations will enhance the TSBs' traditional role in contributing to the life of the community by assisting local needs of many different kinds. The foundations will therefore benefit the communities from which the TSBs have in the past drawn their customers. Clearly, the approach which the charities adopt will change from time to time as local needs and circumstances alter.

8. We have felt it appropriate that the foundations should hold "A" ordinary shares in TSB Group plc which entitle them to vote only on matters affecting their own interests. However, we now undertake that (as mentioned at paragraph 4(iii) above) each foundation (except in the case of the Channel Islands) will in addition be given a special share in the banking subsidiary operating in the same country or territory which will entitle it to appoint two directors to the bank board who will be expected to ensure that the interests of the country or territory concerned are represented in the board's deliberations.

Share Issue

9. Finally, I stated in my letter of 6 December 1984 that we plan to bring about the issue of shares to the public in a way which will achieve wide ownership of the new TSB Group among our customers and staff. We have undertaken to give customers and staff priority over a substantial tranche of shares. I can now add that in relation to the balance of shares we will seek to attract as many small investors as possible, whether or not they are at present customers of the TSB Group. For this purpose we are preparing a major communication programme to promote the widest possible ownership of TSB Group plc. We have set ourselves a target of over one million shareholders.

Yours sincerely,
Sir John Read
Chairman

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Dewar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies in Scotland benefited from assistance under the business expansion scheme in the last year for which records are available; and what proportion of (a) the total number of United Kingdom firms assisted and (b) the total United Kingdom payments made under the scheme were in Scotland.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa (Nuclear Weapons)

Mr. Cabom asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's most recent assessment of whether South Africa has acquired a nuclear weapons capability.

Mr. Luce: We have no conclusive evidence that South Africa has acquired a nuclear weapons capability.

South African Broadcasting Corporation

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many visits have been made to the British Broadcasting Corporation's external services in the last five years by personnel from the South African Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Renton: This is a matter for the management of the BBC external services. However, I understand that the BBC external services estimates that about 20 visits have been made to it in the last five years by personnel from the South African Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what training the British Broadcasting Corporation external service has provided for South African Broadcasting Corporation staff in the last five years.

Mr. Renton: This is a matter for the management of the BBC external services. However, I understand that BBC external services has not provided any training for South African Broadcasting Corporation staff in the last five years.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will list the multilateral and bilateral aid commitments, including aid trade provision equivalent, of the United Kingdom for the last five convenient years; and whether he has comparable information for France, West Germany, Japan and the United States.

Mr. Raison: Commitments of multilateral and bilateral net official development assistance (ODA) for the years 1979-83 for the United Kingdom and the other donors are as follows.

Commitments of aid trade provision funds from within the aid programme for the years 1979 to 1983 were as follows:

	£ million
1979	50·2
1980	23·2
1981	30·6
1982	117·2
1983	26·1

These ATP funds are normally used in association with ECGD guaranteed export credits in order to finance the British content of contracts in developing countries.

The ways in which aid funds are used in order to achieve similar objectives to the aid trade provision differ substantially between donors. Statistics which identify separately financial packages provided by other donors and which are equivalent to the air trade provision are reported to the OECD Secretariat, and provided on a confidential basis to all OECD members, as part of the agreed effort to achieve transparency and greater discipline in this area. The statistics are not published.

Tsetse Fly

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice he has received on the ecological effect of the European Economic plans to participate in the scheme to eradicate tsetse fly from parts of central Africa.

Mr. Raison: Advice was received from my scientific staff and the tsetse research laboratory. This was based on a five-year study by the Tropical Development and Research Institute into the effects of aerial spraying of the chosen insecticide. We were concerned to ensure that the chemical control methods proposed would not cause damage to the environment, and for the same reason insisted on the need for strict planning of the use of land to be freed from infestation.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the European Economic Community proposals to support the project to eradicate tsetse fly in parts of central Africa.

Mr. Raison: The Government supported a proposal which was approved in April 1985 to provide 19·15 million ecu (£11 million) from the European development fund for phase 1 of a tsetse and trypanosomiasis control programme in Zambia and Zimbabwe. Later phases, if approved, will include neighbouring states. Strict planning of the use of the land to be cleared of tsetse flies will be essential to avoid damage to the environment.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which pesticides are being supplied from the United Kingdom for use in the European Economic Community scheme to eradicate tsetse fly in central Africa.

Mr. Raison: British pesticide companies will supply synthetic pyrethroids for trials in the research component of the project. Most of the chemicals, however, will be purchased after an international invitation to tender in accordance with the procedures of the Lomé convention. No organo-chlorines will be used in the project. Endosulphan is to be used for aerial spraying and pyrethroid deltamethrin for fly traps.

EMPLOYMENT

Accident Rates

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the accident rate (a) on the youth training scheme and (b) on all forms of work.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following table sets out the annual incidence rate for 1984-85 per 100,000 trainees on the youth training scheme, separately for fatal, major and minor accidents, calculated on the basis of the average number of trainees in training.

Period *	Average number in training	Accidents			Annual incidence rate per 100,000 trainees
		Fatalities	Major Injuries ‡	Minor Injuries	Fatalities	Major Injuries	Minor Injuries
1 April-31 March 1984	282,408	4	184	1,748	1·4	65·2	619·0

Notes

* The manpower Services Commission's accident figures for the youth training scheme are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the Commission's figures will include a number of accidents, in particular road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational establishments, which may not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.

‡ Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurences Regulations 1980.

‡ During the period 1 January to 31 March 1985, one further fatality involving a youngster on the youth training scheme was notified to the Manpower Services Commission. Investigations to determine the exact causes of the incident and whether it would be reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the youngster been employed are being carried out by the local enforcing authorities.

The provisional incidence rate for 1984 for occupational deaths and major injuries to employees reportable to health and safety enforcing authorities is 60·9 per 100,000 employees. An incidence rate relating to minor injuries is not available.

There are difficulties in making direct comparisons between accident figures for the youth training scheme and statistics published by the Health and Safety Executive for the employed population generally. For example, the age mix is very different (the Health and Safety Executive does not publish separate accident figures for the 16-18 age group), and, in addition, the industry mix and time spent at the workplace may also differ.

Sports Grounds (Safety)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether the Health and Safety Executive has been consulted about proposals to improve safety at sports grounds.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety Executive may be consulted on proposals or see evidence from Government Departments; matters primarily concerning crowd control and public order are however outside the Executive's immediate field of responsibility.

Employee Consultation

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many companies have been studied by his Department with reference to the requirement under section 1 of the Employment Act 1982 to provide, in annual reports, information about what they have done to consult their employees; and what percentage of these have conformed with those requirements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on 10 June at column 362.

Racial Discrimination

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any proposals to seek to reduce racial discrimination in employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are firmly committed to the elimination of all unlawful discrimination and to the promotion of equal opportunities in employment for all workers regardless of race. The Commission for Racial Equality's code of practice gives practical guidance on how to achieve these ends and the Department's race relations employment advisers are giving priority to advising employers and trade unions on the implications of the code.

The Manpower Services Commission seeks to ensure equal access for people of different races to all its public employment and training services and also supports language training to improve the employment prospects of members of ethnic minorities.

In addition, the Department is playing a full part in implementing the Government's policy of ensuring equal opportunity in the Civil Service for people from the ethnic minorities, both at the recruitment stage and in their subsequent careers.

The reduction and elimination of racial discrimination in employment requires not only action by Government but also the support of employers, trade unions and the community in general.

Health and Safety Inspection

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state for each year from 1974 to the most recent available date, both nationally and for the Greater London council area (a) the total number of health and safety executive inspectors, as now defined, (b) the total number of workplaces they had to inspect, (c) the total number of workplaces they actually inspected, (d) the total number of prosecutions undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive and (e) the total number of accidents and incidents visited.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is not available in the form requested. The total number of Health and Safety Executive inspectors, and of factory inspectors in the area offices within the Greater London Council area from 1977 when these area offices were set up are set out in the following table. The other Health and Safety Executive inspectorates do not have any field staff in the London area.

Year	Numbers in post at 1 June: Inspectors in HSE (including those in headquarters)	Factory inspectors in HSE Areas 5 and 6 (Covering Greater London)
1977	1,384	85*
1978	1,413	78*
1979	1,425	90*
1980	1,443	80*
1981	1,380	87
1982	1,320	77
1983	1,272	75
1984	1,236	70
1985	1,259	74

* Including some specialist inspectors subsequently relocated outside London while continuing to operate in London as well as surrounding areas.

The remainder of the information requested is unavailable or could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons are currently claiming unemployment benefit: how many of them are registered at (a) jobcentres and (b) careers offices; and what these figures represent as percentages of the overall unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985 there were 3,057,190 unemployed claimants in Great Britain. On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which a figure is available, there were 163,690 unemployed persons registered at careers offices. On 7 June 1985 there were 499,252 persons registered at jobcentres. This latter figure may include a number of people seeking a change of employment and others who are not claiming unemployment benefit. Taking these two factors into account, giving an answer in percentage terms would deprive the answer of any real meaning.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish his latest estimate of the numbers (a) who leave youth training schemes before the completion of training, and for which reason and (b) who, on completion of youth training schemes, find employment; and if he will publish a table showing the proportion of entrants who find employment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following table shows the number and proportion of young people who left the youth training scheme between July and September 1984 before the completion of training:

1984	Number in training at month end (000's)	Number of early leavers in month (000's)	Early leavers as percentage of in training total
July	283·2	5·4	2
August	292·0	7·0	2
September	310·5	7·4	2

The Manpower Services Commission conducts a regular monthly survey of leavers from the scheme. Questionnaires are sent to a 15 per cent. sample of all leavers some three months after they leave the scheme. Results are placed in the Library. The latest analysis of reasons given by young people for leaving the scheme early relates to those who left between July and September 1984 and is as follows (the total comes to more than 100 per cent. because some young people gave more than one reason):

	Percentage of early leavers
Scheme had finished	2
Got a full-time job	49
Got a part-time job	3
Joined another YTS scheme	9
Ill	4
Scheme not providing training needed	13
Not happy on scheme	23
Pay was too low	19
Some other reason	22

The same survey shows that 62 per cent. of young people who completed training during the period July-September 1984 found employment.

Information is not available on the proportion of entrants who find employment. However, the survey referred to shows that some 60 per cent. of young people leaving the scheme between July and September 1984 (the peak leaving period) went into employment.

DEFENCE

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether local authority police committees will be notified in addition to the chief constables in the areas where Exercise Brave Defender is to take place.

Mr. Lee: This will be a matter for the chief constables concerned to decide.

Armed Forces (Retirement Statistics)

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report tables showing the total numbers of officers and men of each rank-equivalent who retired during the periods (a) 1 April 1977 to 31 March 1978 and (b) 1 April 1983 to 31 March 1984, indicating the numbers of those (i) receiving a reduced pension because of premature retirement, (ii) who commuted a part of their pension and (iii) who have since died, distinguishing between those who have surviving widows and those who do not, and giving the total pension cost for the year 1984-85 in respect of those who retired during each of the specified periods.

Mr. Lee: The number of those who retired from whatever cause in the periods 1 April 1977 to 31 March 1978 and 1 April 1983 to 31 March 1984 and who were in receipt of pension on 31 March 1984 is as follows:

	1977-78		1983-84
Rank*	Male	Female	Male	Female
Lt. General and above	22	—	8	—
Maj. General	47	—	26	—

	1977-78		1983-84
*Rank	Male	Female	Male	Female
Lance Corporal and below	681	3	338	4

* Including equivalent ranks in the RN and RAF.

Note:

Certain pensions associated with disability are borne on DHSS votes and are not included in the above table.

Answers to the specific questions at (i) to (iii) could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Royalties

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions his Department has had with GEC Avionics about potential royalties to Her Majesty's Government in respect of supply of its airborne early warning system for Lockheed's Hercules C130 transport planes.

Mr. Lee: A basic agreement exists with the Company about charges for any commercial exploitation of their work on AEW but no detailed discussions have yet taken place specifically related to the possible C130 application.

Foreign Service Men (Training)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total income received from providing training for service men from overseas armed forces for each of the last three years for which figures are available; and, of this, how much is attributable to training Chilean service men.

Mr. Lee: The total estimated charges for training foreign and commonwealth personnel in the United Kingdom for each of the last three financial years are as follows:

	£ million
1984-85	32
1983-84	31·6
1982-83	22·8

Contained within these figures are elements which are not direct training charges but which are related to foreign and commonwealth training (for example, messing and accommodation).

It is not our practice to reveal details of training provided for individual countries since this information is confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the Government concerned.

WALES

Wrexham (Job Creation)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he proposes to take to stimulate employment opportunities in the Wrexham area in the light of the decision by Dunlop to close down its plant at Wrexham.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: We will take this closure, with the loss of some 100 jobs, fully into account when considering the local authorities' detailed proposals for the allocation of planned resources, including those for the Clwyd area announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 27 June.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union (Baltic States)

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is currently taken by Her Majesty's ambassador in Moscow in acknowledgement of the fact that Her Majesty's Government do not recognise the incorporation of the Baltic states into the Soviet Union de jure.

Mr. Rifkind: Her Majesty's ambassador in Moscow avoids any contact with the authorities in the Baltic states which could be taken to imply de jure recognition. The Soviet Government has been made aware of our position on a number of occasions.

Compensation

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has claimed compensation from the Soviet Union for the British lives lost when the Soviet military authorities shot down Korean Air Lines flight 007 on 1 September 1983.

Mr. Renton: Yes. Fourteen persons entitled to our protection were killed then and a national claim for compensation of £2 million was handed to the Soviet Embassy on 3 July.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table comparing the increase in the profitability of exports with the increase in relative export prices and relative unit labour costs, together with an explanation of the transmission mechanism from costs to prices and profits over the relevant period.

Mr. Fletcher: Figures on actual profitability are not available. An index of relative profitability, together with the other indices, is in the table. The actual profitability of exports will depend on the relationship between prices and costs, the largest element of which is the cost of labour.

Asbestos

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about his discussions with the textured ceiling and wall coatings industry about the elimination of asbetos from their products; and when such elimination is expected.

Mr. Fletcher: In November last year my Department asked the trade to eliminate asbestos from their produtcts as soon as possible. The brand leader stated that they had already done so and most of the other manufacturers reported that they had done so or were about to do so.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what publicity arrangements are being undertaken to warn of the hazard involved in stripping textured ceiling and wall coatings which contain asbestos; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Commercially textured ceiling and wall coverings containing asbestos may only be removed by contractors licensed by the Health and Safety Executive: such contractors must know the precautions to be taken. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has published a comprehensive booklet "Asbestos Materials in Buildings" which states that textured paint containing asbestos should never be sanded down, and that if it must be removed it should be thoroughly wetted in order to soften it and damp down any dust, and then scraped off. In addition, he has published a leaflet "Asbestos in housing" for mass circulation which advises householders not to rub down textured paint containing asbestos and that asbestos materials in good condition can be painted to prevent dust from escaping.

but that they should consult their environmental health department about removing large amounts of asbestos materials.

Company Liquidations

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the number of company liquidations (a) between 1974 and 1979 and (b) from 1980 until the latest available date.

Mr. Fletcher: The number of company liquidations in England and Wales was:

1974 to 1979 inclusive	30,511
1980 to May 1985 inclusive	61,190

Source: British business.

Water Reed

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from producers of water reed about the effects on the thatching industry of the growth of equivalent subsidised imports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has received one letter from the hon. Member for North Devon. We have received no evidence that the imported thatching reed is subsidised. Supplies of cheaper (and apparently good quality) reed appear to be in the interests of British thatchers and their customers.

Shipbuilding (Intervention Fund)

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has concluded negotiations with the European Commission on a new intervention fund regime for shipbuilding.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. The new arrangements, which apply to orders taken from July 1984 and last until December 1986, permit an increased rate of up to 20½ per cent. intervention fund plus 2 per cent. shipbuilders relief. For vessels over 70,000 dead weight tonnes built in Northern Ireland, the maximum may be increased to 25½ per cent. plus 2 per cent. shipbuilders relief. The Commission has indicated also that it will be prepared to consider payments above these levels on a case by case basis particularly for orders where there is no EC competition.

I believe these new, more generous arrangements provide a satisfactory basis for the industry until the end of next year. The United Kingdom industry must use the opportunity offered by these measures to continue to improve its competitive position, so that in the future it may survive with steadily reducing levels of assistance.

Intervention fund assistance is essentially intended as a temporary aid to merchant shipbuilding and it is provided only for contracts taken on a non-profit basis. Aid of this kind will thus not normally be appropriate for, nor provided to, yards which have been or are to be privatised by British shipbuilders. The Commission has, however, agreed to consider any case where exceptionally, for reasons related to the maintenance of defence capacity, intervention fund support might be given.

ENVIRONMENT

Wild Birds (Habitat Protection)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response has been provided to the European Commission in reply to its letter dated 10 September 1984 concerning the protection of Duich Moss (Islay), a site of international importance for wild birds; and if he will reproduce in the Official Report the letter from the European Commission dated 10 September 1984 on this subject.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The following is the text of the letter of 10 September 1984 received from the European Commission:

"The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has filed a complaint against the British Government alleging non-observance of requirements of the directive on the conservation of wild birds (79 409 EEC) with respect to the protection of an important bird area on the Scottish Island of Islay.

The area concerned is described on the information sheet enclosed. It is also listed in the report of the Commission entitled: 'Apercu des zones de grant interet pour la conservation des oiseaux sauvages'.

Considering that the area is clearly of Community importance for bird preservation, may I ask your Government to take the necessary steps to protect the area in accordance with the provisions of article 4 paragraph 4 of the directive 79 409 EEC and to add this area to the UK list of special protection areas.

I would be most grateful for an early reply."

The reply of 1 July was as follows:

"DIRECTIVE 79 409

I must regret the delay in replying to a series of letters from Mr. Andreopoulos about the application of the wild birds directive to an area of the Scottish island if Islay. You reminded us of this correspondence in a telex of 21 May to Sir Michael Butler.

You will be pleased to hear that the area of Islay in question, Duich Moss, was designated as a site of special scientific interest on 19 July 1984 under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. This is an essential first step before Duich Moss can be considered for designation as a special protection area under article 4 of the directive. The necessary consultations to prepare for this designation are beginning in September.

Meanwhile the whole of the site of which Duich Moss is a part, which extends to some 1,419 acres, is receiving the protection appropriate to its status as a site of special scientific interest. The effect of this protection is to impose certain restrictions on particularly operations which would, in the opinion of the nature conservancy council, be detrimental to the scientific interests of the site.

However, these protective provisions do not preclude the carrying out on the land of any operation which has been authorised by the granting of planning permission, with any attendant conditions. Such permission has been given by the Secretary of State for Scotland for the digging of peat from an area of some 150 acres within the site of special scientific interest, the first phase being confined to an area of 44 acres. The background to the decision is set out in an annex to this letter. You will see that the strict conditions which have been set for the planning permission are designed to minimise disturbances to the Greenland white-fronted geese which roost on Duich Moss over the winter, and to ensure that the general nature conservation interest of the Moss is not adversely affected."

Local Government Finance

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those items of expenditure for which a disregard has been requested under section 8(4) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 in respect of 1985-86 expenditure.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Environment Minister

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the meeting of European Community Environment Ministers on 27 June.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 3 July to the hon. Member for Renfrew West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley).

Retail Developments

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his present policy in relation to planning applications for large new retail developments; whether that policy has recently changed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: After considering the representations that I have received on this subject, I have concluded that it is not necessary to add more detailed advice to that given in development control policy note 13 ("Large New Stores") and in the memorandum on structure and local plans published last year. It is important, however, to stress the point made explicitly in the existing guidance that it is not the function of the planning system to inhibit competition among retailers or among methods of retailing, nor to preserve existing commercial interests as such; it must take into account the benefits to the public which flow from new developments in the distributive and retailing fields. The public needs a wide range of shopping facilities and benefits from competition between them. Local planning authorities must take full account of these various needs, both in framing structure and local plans and in dealing with applications for new shopping developments of all types.

Since commercial competition as such is not a land-use planning consideration, the possible effects of a proposed major retail development on existing retailers is not in this sense a relevant factor in deciding planning applications and appeals. It will be necessary, however, to take account in exceptional circumstances of the cumulative effects of other recent and proposed large scale retail developments in the locality, and to consider whether they are on such a scale and of a kind that they could seriously affect the vitality and viability of a nearby town centre as a whole —for example, whether they seem likely to result in a significant increase in vacant properties, or a marked reduction in the range of services the town centre provides, such as could lead to its general physical deterioration and to the detriment of its future place in the economic and social life of the community. Town centres need to maintain their diversity and activity if they are to retain their vitality, but the range and variety of shops and services will change, as they have always done, in response to changing conditions.

I and my inspectors will decide planning appeals in the light of these general principles and of the extent to which they are adequately dealt with in development plans, and in relation to the land-use planning and traffic considerations raised by individual cases.

As at 1 January 1985 there were 260 hypermarkets and superstores built and opened in England and Wales compared with 125 in January 1979 and only 26 in 1973. Planning permission has been given for 67 more. These figures show that the planning system can facilitate the development of these new types of retailing, for which there is a clear public demand.

Stockbridge Village Trust

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what inquiries have been made by the Minister for Housing and Construction following the undertaking which he gave to the House during the debate on 1 July, Official Report, c. 67, concerning Stockbridge Village Trust; and what is the result of those inquiries.

Mr. Gow: I have made inquiries into the circumstances of the industrial dispute referred to by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) and of the company involved, JGM Building Services Ltd. I understand that the sequence of events was as follows:

—on 18 February 1985 all of those employed directly by JGM Building Services Ltd. at Stockbridge Village withdrew their labour. I understand that the reason for this action was that six men employed on a planned maintenance contract that was drawing to a close had been served with notices of redundancy by the same employer. Six men working on the same contract were retained for other work.

—Several meetings between management and UCATT failed to resolve the dispute and Mr. Michael Carter, Chief Executive of Stockbridge Village, agreed to chair a meeting between the two sides, although the trust was not involved in the dispute.

—The meeting was held on 26 April 1985, and reached agreement on the basis for a settlement. The key elements were: that all those who were on strike would be taken back including those who had received redundancy notices; that four labour-only subcontractors employed by the company would be offered direct employment, and, that if they refused, they would be replaced by direct employees; and that there would be more flexible working arrangements between day-to-day maintenance and planned maintenance work.

—The men resumed work on 7 May.

—On 13 June the trust received a telephone call from JGM's bankers asking for urgent payment of monies owned to the company. The trust agreed to pay, on the basis of certified accounts available that day, for works completed satisfactorily on day-to-day maintenance. A payment of £19,000 was made on 14 June 1985. No money was paid at that time in respect of planned maintenance contracts, which are financed, in part, with the aid grant.

—On 18 June the trust was notified that JGM Building Services Ltd. would be going into voluntary liquidation.

I can make no comment on the allegations of intimidation and threats of violence. If these have validity they are a matter for the police. The four labour-only subcontractors are in possession of 714 certificates. Mr. Tom Baron, the chairman of the Stockbridge Village Trust, has no financial interest in the village and he was not involved in any way in this industrial dispute.

Football Spectator Violence

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent meeting of European Ministers responsible for sport to discuss football spectator violence.

Mr. Macfarlane: I represented the United Kingdom at an informal meeting of Ministers responsible for sport convened on Thursday 27 June by the Secretary-General of the Council of Europe. We agreed on a European convention on violence and misbehaviour at sports events, and in particular at football matches, and invited the committee of Ministers to adopt and open for signature the convention at the earliest opportunity with a view to its coming in force in time for the next round of European football matches. We also requested all governments entitled to do so to become parties to the convention as soon as possible.

I hope that the convention will be adopted and opened for signature by the committee of Ministers later this month. A copy of the authenticated version of the convention will be placed in the Library of the House as soon as it is available. When in force, contracting parties will be obliged to:

co-ordinate the policies and actions of their government departments and other public agencies against spectator violence and misbehaviour; ensure that adequate public order resources are employed to counter outbreaks of violence and misbehaviour, near and inside grounds, and also along transit route used by spectators; and facilitate co-operation and exchange of information between police forces of different localities; seek to ensure that offenders (especially visiting supporters) are identified and prosecuted and that they receive appropriate penalties; introduce procedures to identify problem matches in advance, and for effective co-operation between authorities and clubs on precautions and measures to be taken;

encourage the co-ordination of travel arrangements to inhibit potential troublemakers from leaving to attend matches;

encourage the use of stewards and supporters' clubs for crowd control and information;

press football and local authorities, stadium owners and clubs to take the necessary practical measures for problem matches, eg in the design, improvement and selection of stadia, segregation, alcohol control, ticket sales and the exclusion of drunks and troublemakers; encourage football authorities to review their regulations continuously;

looking further ahead, take social and educational measures to promote the more positive side of sport, eg fair play and active participation; establish a standing committee to police the operation of the convention and propose improvements.

We also agreed to propose to the Union of European Football Associations (UEFA) that they should introduce binding requirements, both for the use of stadia and the organisation of matches held under their auspices having regard to the provisions of the proposed convention. An official working group of the Council of Europe is to hold discussions with UEFA to prepare a draft memorandum of understanding which would give effect to these proposals. The group will report back as soon as possible to a future meeting of European sports Ministers.

PRIME MINISTER

Endangered Species

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer of 28 June, Official Report, column 501, about the proceedings of the committee on international trade in endangered species regulations, whether the United Kingdom has questioned or made representations about the reasons for the rules of procedure of the committee requiring confidentiality; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The proceedings of European Community committees of this nature are normally confidential (in the same way that proceedings of meetings of officials within the United Kingdom would be so regarded). There is no reason to make an exception for this committee.

EC (Agricultural Spending Limits)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister (1) pursuant to her statement of 2 July, of the proposals she submitted to the Milan summit would permit individual member states to use a veto to prevent the Council of Ministers from agreeing to exceed agricultural spending limits established in accordance with the budgetary controls agreed at the Fontainebleau summit:

(2) pursuant to her statement of 2 July, of the proposals she submitted to the Milan summit would permit individual member states to use a veto to prevent the Council of Ministers from agreeing agricultural spending budgets which exceed increases in the own resources of the Community.

The Prime Minister: The text on institutional questions which I tabled at the Milan European Council did not propose any change to the council conclusions of 4 December on budgetary discipline nor did it alter the United Kingdom view that, when a member state considers its very important interests to be at stake, discussion should continue until unanimous agreement is reached.

Northern Africa (Food Aid)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what is the latest figure for the proportion of the 1·2 million tons of EEC food aid allocated for the drought suffering countries of Northern Africa at the Dublin summit which has actually been delivered; and what amount has been delivered to each country.

The Prime Minister: The European Council on 28-29 June noted that two thirds of the 1·2 million tonnes of grain pledged at the Dublin Council had been delivered or was on its way. This includes deliveries to Mozambique and Angola. The latest available figures for deliveries by the Community to each of the worst affected countries of the Sahel and east Africa are those given by my right hon. Friend, the Minister for Overseas Development to my hon. Friend, the member for Hereford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on 6 June at column 198-99. In addition, the following deliveries were reported by member states from their share of the Dublin plan between January and May:

Tonnes of cereals or cereals equivalent

	Tonnes
Ethiopia	68,500
Sudan	59,500
Chad	28,000
Mali	12,000
Mauritania	6,200
Niger	29,000
Burkina Faso	n a

A further co-ordination meeting will be held on 8 July in Brussels, when we expect to receive more up-to-date figures.

Law Lords

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: asked the Prime Minister when she intends to announce the names of those who will replace the Law Lords who are due to retire in 1986, namely: the right hon. Lord Scarman, the right hon. Lord Roskill and the right hon. Lord Brightman.

The Prime Minister: An announcement will be made in due course.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Political Asylum

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many foreign nationals have applied for political asylum in the United Kingdom in each year since 1979;

(2) how many foreign nationals have been granted political asylum in the United Kingdom in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waddington: The number of applications for asylum received (from all nationalities) and granted from 1979 to 1984 are as follows:

	Applied for	Granted
1979	1,563	525
1980	2,352	1,147
1981	2,425	1,473
1982	4,223	1,727
1983	4,296	1,185
1984	3,478	584

Notes:

(i) These figures do not include those admitted under the Indo-Chinese refugee programme.

(ii) Applications are not necessarily decided in the same year as they are received.

(iii) Following the computerisation of refugee statistics the figures for 1979 to 1983 have been recalculated and differ from those previously published. Detailed statistics for 1984 and revised figures for earlier years will shortly be placed in the Library.

(iv) The figures of those granted asylum do not include those given exceptional leave to enter or remain.

Women (Protection)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate what plans the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has to seek to ensure the safety of women on the streets, especially in inner London areas.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis attaches great importance to reducing the incidence and fear of street crime. He has made it a priority to increase the number of officers on the beat; and he has also encouraged officers to use public transport, both on and off duty, to provide protection and reassurance for the travelling public. These measures are aimed at the protection of the community as a whole, but should be of particular benefit to women. At the local level, it is the responsibility of district commanders to respond to particular concerns about the safety of women and to deploy resources accordingly.

Embarkation Information

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) why information concerning the embarkation of visitors from the United Kingdom is not available; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will take steps to ensure that information is kept on the embarkation of visitors from the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will undertake a study of the application of new technology on the collation of statistics on embarkations of visitors from the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: Comprehensive statistical information on the embarkation of visitors is not available because the cost of its production would greatly outweigh its usefulness. We have no plans to produce such information. The present arrangement, which represents a more effective use of resources, is to record on entry on the current computer system those whose embarkation is likely to need to be checked.

Possible further uses of new technology in the immigration control, including the production of statistics, are being examined as part of the computing strategy of the Immigration and Nationality Department.

Civil Defence

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state for each of the financial years from 1980-81 to 1987-88, the actual or projected figures for (a) total civil defence expenditure from his Department's budget and (b) expenditure on grants-in-aid to local authorities for civil defence purposes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Police Officers

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for each year since 1979 what was the number of police officers in England and Wales who, respectively, were reduced in rank, had their rate of pay reduced, were fined, were reprimanded or were cautioned.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following information is available from records in the Home Office. A separate table for the Metropolitan police has been prepared because the information for that force is notified in different form:

(1) ENGLAND AND WALES (EXCLUDING THE METROPOLITAN POLICE)

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
(a) Disciplinary offences other than criminal conduct
Reduction in rank	18	22	16	22	16	18
Reduction in pay	18	22	22	21	19	21
Fine	283	262	280	316	194	220
Reprimand	120	108	106	104	92	103
Caution	46	58	56	56	44	30

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
(b) Criminal conduct
Reduction in rank	4	4	1	2	4	3
Reprimand or caution	66	64	92	77	110	81

Note:
The punishment of a reduction in the accused's rate of pay or of a fine cannot be imposed for the offence of criminal conduct. If an officer has been dealt with for criminal conduct and another disciplinary offence, he will be recorded in both tables.

(2) METROPOLITAN POLICE

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Disciplinary offences (including criminal conduct)

DEFENCE

Low Frequency Communications

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to the answer of 24 June Official Report, column 289, if he will indicate the year by year expenditure to date on extra low frequency communications systems and the projected year to year future expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: It is not our practice to make available details of year by year expenditure on equipment projects. However, total expenditure to date is approximately £350K.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Defence what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Butler: During the period 1 April 1984 to 31 March 1985, civilian staff numbers in the Ministry of Defence reduced by 7,108 to a total of 174,075. This excludes 18,967 staff of the Royal ordnance factories who were transferred out of the Civil Service on 2 January 1985 with the formation of Royal Ordnance plc.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the list of key points to be defended as part of Exercise Brave Defender has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 28 June 1985 at columns 516-17.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Labour Statistics

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Sir Keith Joseph: Between 1 April 1984 and 1 April 1985 the number of staff in the Department increased by 48, well within the agreed manpower ceilings which rose from 2,402 at 1 April 1984 to 2,472 at 1 April 1985. The 1985 ceiling allowed for an expansion of Her Majesty's inspectorate to support the Government's policies to raise standards in education.

Drug Misuse

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the range of materials for drug misuse education which his Department proposes to fund for production through the Health Education Council and other bodies, indicating the reason for each item and the quantities in which each will be produced.

Mr. Dunn: Work on this project has started but is, as yet, in its early stages. The materials planned are:

A manual for teachers and teaching materials—for use in drugs education;

A curriculum guide to help ensure that drugs education is correctly located in the curriculum;

A handbook for teacher trainers.

These materials were selected to provide a comprehensive and coherent range of support for work in schools and colleges. Arrangements for dissemination will be considered in more detail as the poject proceeds but the intention is to make the materials readily available through existing networks.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how he intends to assess the efficiency of activities against drug misuse undertaken by the new co-ordinators to be appointed by local education authorities in 1986.

Mr. Dunn: An initial assessment will be based on the proposals contained in the bids submitted by local education authorities. Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools will be involved in this assessment process. Effectiveness will be judged subsequently on the basis of reports on the activities promoted.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidelines he will be providing to help local education authority co-ordinators to stimulate the most effective activities against drug misuse.

Mr. Dunn: General guidelines are set out in the DES circular on the education support grants programme for 1986-87 to be issued shortly. Existing types of activity vary and so it is expected that a range of activities will be supported, in accordance with local needs. However, key activities are expected to be: providing advice and support for the local authority's schools and colleges and for other staff including youth workers; arranging for the training of staff, co-ordinating education service activity with that of other local agencies: and liaison with appropriate national bodies.

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how the additional funding of £2 million for drug misuse education will be applied in 1985-86 as between paying for co-ordinators, expansion of the local education authority advisory service, preparation and production of educational programmes to tie in with current Home Office publicity campaigns, the preparation of staff education programmes and joint programmes with outside agencies and with parent groups.

Mr. Dunn: The allocation of funding will depend on the precise activities proposed by local education authorities in their responses to the circular which will be issued shortly. My right hon. Friend would expect that in most cases the majority of the expenditure will be incurred in staffing costs.

Health Education

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how soon Her Majesty's inspectors' of schools discussion document "Health Education from 5 to 16 years" will be available; and in what quantities.

Mr. Dunn: The discussion document about health education is one of a number that Her Majesty's inspectors' are currently working on. It is not possible at this stage to say precisely when it will be ready for publication. When it is completed and published, it will be available in sufficient quantity for copies to be sent free to every LEA, primary and secondary school, teacher training institution as well as to a wide number of other interested parties. Copies will also be available on request from the DES.

School Leavers (Reading Ability)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evidence is available to him as to the average reading ability of those leaving school at (a) 16 years and (b) 18 years.

Mr. Dunn: Surveys conducted for the assessment of performance unit between 1979 and 1983 in schools other than special schools show that at age 15 virtually all pupils are able to read in the sense that they can decode written words. Decoding is only one aspect of reading, however, and although there are no national figures for reading ability among 16-year-old and 18-year-old school leavers, there are indications (including results from local surveys of statutory school age pupils) that there is scope for improvement in standards of literacy.

Further Education

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from polytechnics following the Audit Commission report on obtaining better value in further education.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has not received any representations from polytechnics or their maintaining authorities; he has, however, received a letter on this subject from the association of polytechnic teachers.

Teacher-Pupil Ratio

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his general policy towards the teacher-to-pupil ratio in schools in the light of falling school rolls.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend acknowledged in the White Paper "Better Schools" that some further limited improvement in the overall pupil-to-teacher ratio would be needed in order to give effect to the Government's policies for the curriculum and examinations. The extent to which the improvement can be achieved, and the pace of any change, must depend on future public expenditure plans. The benefits to be gained from any improvement will depend on local education authorities seeking to deploy teachers to maximum effect, taking account of changes in pupil numbers.

Education Committee Co-optees

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how the present numbers and classes of education committee co-optees compare with those prior to 1973.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not available.

Teacher Statistics (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of teachers of mathematics, physics and chemistry in secondary schools in the west midlands region in each single year since 1979, and the number of science teaching posts in schools, further education colleges, polytechnics and universities in the region which are unfilled.

Mr. Dunn: Information on the subjects being taught by secondary school teachers in particular regions is not available centrally. In January 1985 local education authorities in the West Midlands region reported to the Department that they had 48 unfilled vacancies for full-time permanent posts in maintained secondary schools for which mathematics, physics or chemistry was the main teaching subject required. There were a further 19 vacancies in other sciences and computer studies. Corresponding figures are not available centrally of vacancies in further education colleges, polytechnics or universities.

SCOTLAND

University of Aberdeen

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek to ensure that the future of the B.Sc. (AGR) at the university of Aberdeen is not affected by the proposed cuts in research and development and advisory services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the real increase in the salary in each grade of nurse, since April 1979, including the current proposed increases to February 1986.

Mr. John MacKay: Increases in maxima of pay scales for the main nursing pay grades since 1 April 1979 are set out in the following table. The percentages shown should be seen against the movement of the Retail Price Index of 75 per cent. during the period to 14 May 1985.

Grades	1 April 1979 £	1 February 1986 £	Increase Percentage
Senior Nurse 6 (Senior Nursing Officer I	6,013	11,555	92·2
Senior Nurse 8 (Nursing Officer II)	5,380	10,460	94·4
Nursing Sister II (Ward Sister)	4,949	10,000	102·1
Staff Nurse	3,813	7,175	88·2
Enrolled Nurse	3,411	6,500	90·6
Nursing Auxiliary	2,915	5,120	75·6
Student—3rd Year	2,667	4,580	71·7
Director of Nurse Education I	8,601	17,470	103·1
Senior Tutor	6,150	11,870	93
Tutor	5,742	11,425	98·9
Clinical Teacher	5,380	10,675	98·4

Dentists

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what were the average annual expenses paid to dentists in the National Health Service in Scotland in the two years 1983-84 and 1984-85;

(2) what were the practice expenses paid in 1984 to each dentist in the National Health Service whose earnings were over £100,000.

Mr. John MacKay: Only estimated figures are yet available for average expenses—£26,051 for 1983-84 and £27,433 for 1984-85. Expenses are not directly reimbursed, but are allowed for in the general level of fees paid to dentists.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many dentists employed in the National Health Service in Scotland are in receipt of gross annual earnings of over £100,000;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the gross earnings of dentists in the National Health Service in 1984, showing the highest and lowest annual earnings paid;

(3) how many dentists employed in the National Health Service in Scotland in 1984 had gross annual earnings of up to £20,000, £20,000 to £30,000, £30,000 to £40,000, £40,000 to £50,000, £50,000 to £60,000, £60,000 to £70,000 and £70,000 upwards.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

*Number of general dental practitioners

Gross earnings in 1984†	Number
Up to £20,000	133
£20,000 to £30,000	132
£30,000 to £40,000	242
£40,000 to £50,000	300
£50,000 to £60,000	157
£60,000 to £70,000	108
£70,000 to £100,000	73
Over £100,000	11

Lowest individual gross earnings = £102
Highest individual gross earnings = £133,716

* These numbers relate to principals and exclude practitioners not "in contract" with a Health Board for at least 50 weeks in the year.

† Against the gross payments made to practitioners have to be set deductions in respect of surgery premises, equipment and supporting staff.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of examinations which took place in 1983 and 1984 of the work done by those National Health Service dentists with gross earnings of £100,000 in the relevant year; and with what results;

(2) how many examinations took place in 1984 of the work done by those National Health Service dentists with gross earnings of over £100,000; and what were the results.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	1983	1984
Number of dentists with gross earnings of £100,000 or more	12	11
Number of references to the regional dental service in respect of work by those dentists	77	50

In five cases reported on by the regional dental service in 1983 and three cases in 1984, the dental advisers of the Scottish Dental Estimates Board considered that the work had been unsatisfactory.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed by the Scottish Dental Estimates Board for the purpose of monitoring dentists' activities in 1984; and what is the current total.

Mr. John MacKay: All staff of the Scottish Dental Estimates Board are engaged to some extent in monitoring dentists' activities. Staff numbers are as follows:

	1984	1985
Dental advisers	4·5	4·5
Clerical and administrative staff	172·5	172·5
TOTAL	177	177

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients were on hospital waiting lists in March for each of the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers on waiting lists at March of each year were as follows:

	Numbers
1980	69,904
1981	67,679
1982	66,692
1983	96,757
1984	85,364

The provisional figure for September 1984 is 83,061.

The increase in waiting lists caused by industrial action in 1982 is now being steadily reduced. Lists tend to overstate numbers of patients waiting for treatment since they include duplicated entries and patients who no longer need treatment.

Psychiatric Hospital Buildings

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the latest estimate of the capital expenditure needed to bring up to satisfactory standards the stock of psychiatric hospital buildings; and how soon he expects to achieve this target.

Mr. John MacKay: The survey of the hospital stock carried out in 1981 found that some £200 million required to be spent over about 10 years to bring the stock up to standard, of which £27 million was attributable to self-contained psychiatric hospitals.

Over the past three years I have made special allocations of £55 million to health boards for upgrading work. It is for boards themselves to decide on the priorities for the use of this money, and the extent to which they wish to use their normal allocations for this purpose.

Hospital Statistics

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by health board area all hospitals which (a) closed and (b) opened, indicating the numbers of beds involved in 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to my replies of 7 May to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) at columns 372-73.

Mentally Ill and Handicapped People

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of National Health Service beds is occupied by mentally ill and mentally handicapped persons; what percentage of consultants work with such patients; and if he will also provide the actual numbers involved.

Mr. John MacKay: For the National Health Service in Scotland, the information for 1984 is as follows:

Percentage of NHS hospital beds occupied by patients with		Percentage of NHS consultants working with patients with
(a) Mental illness	(b) Mental deficiency	(a) Mental illness	(b) Mental deficiency
30·3	12·5	11·3	0·6

The total average number of occupied beds (March 1984) for mental illness patients is 14,264 and for mental deficiency patients 5,882 beds. The number of consultants (September 1984) in psychiatry is 219·4 (whole-time equivalents) and in mental deficiency 11·6 (whole-time equivalents).

Mental Hospitals

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the weekly cost of food for patients in mental hospitals; and what is the comparable cost for other hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 5 December 1984 at columns 214-16. Information for 1984-85 is not yet available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the increase in the numbers of long-term unemployed in Scotland in each of the last four years, defining long-term unemployed as those out of work for longer than 52 weeks.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's letter of 22 October 1984. Information relating to the numbers of unemployed in Scotland for over 52 weeks is available in the Library. It is difficult to make comparisions between the figures over the last four years because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982, and the effect of the 1983 Budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 and over, no longer have to sign on at unemployment benefit offices to receive benefit.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of people unemployed in Scotland whose last known employment was in the construction industry at the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Younger: The information requested is available in the Library. The industrial analysis of the unemployed registrants from which this information is obtained was discontinued in May 1982 which is therefore the latest date for which the information is available.

List D Schools

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what steps he has taken to satisfy himself of the ability of social work departments in regional local authorities to deal with children from list D schools who have multiple problems; and if he will make a statement.

(2) what representations he has received against transferring list D schools to social work departments within regional local authorities;

(3) which regional local authority departments will receive grants aid under his proposal to transfer the functions of list D schools to local authorities.

Mr. John McKay: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to a question tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie) on 6 June at column 257.

The majority of the children in the list D schools are already in the statutory care of local authorities. I do not believe that the ability of authorities to discharge their responsibilities will be affected by the changes which I propose to introduce in arrangements for financial support of the schools. The additional rate support grant payable under these arrangements will go to authorities and will not be earmarked to particular departments. I have however suggested to the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities that it might wish to consider a new specific grant.

Representations against my proposals have recently been made by the Church of Scotland, the Roman Catholic hierarchy and children's hearing interests. At an earlier stage the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the list D Schools' Association indicated that they would prefer the present arrangements to continue.

Migration

Mr. Dewar: asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the rate of migration from Scotland in each year since 1979 for which records are available, expressed (a) as a percentage of total population, (b) as a percentage of labour force and (c) as a total number.

Mr. Younger: The information requested in (a) and (c), covering 1 July to 30 June in each case, is as follows:

	Estimated net emigrants	Percentage of population start of period
1979-80	16,300	0·3
1980-81	23,100	0·4
1981-82	14,900	0·3
1982-83	17,800	0·3
1983-84	9,100	0·2

Comparison of the number of migrants with the size of the labour force is not meaningful because not all migrants are members of the labour force.

Estimates of net migration of members of the labour force are not available. A table comparable to the one above, but restricted to the age group 15-64, is given below.

	Estimated net emigrants aged 15-64	Percentage of population aged 15-64 at start of period
1979-80	11,100	0·3
1980-81	15,700	0·5
1981-82	10,200	0·3
1982-83	14,200	0·4
1983-84	7,100	0·2

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether unemployment benefit offices keep a record of the names and addresses of the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The names and addresses of all unemployed people claiming benefits are recorded at an an unemployment benefit office to enable, where necessary, payments to be sent to them by post.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Employment what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Between 1 April 1984 and 1 April 1985 the number of permanent staff in my Department has decreased by 1,637.

Pay Statistics

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage increases in pay have been received by firemen, dustmen, local government officials, non-industrial civil servants and teachers in each of the past five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The available estimates of the percentage increases in average gross weekly earnings of full-time employees working a full week covered by the collective agreements identified in the new earnings survey corresponding as far as possible with the groups referred to are set out in the following table.

Percentage Increases in Average Gross Weekly Earnings of Adult Employees

	April to April

(a) For April 1979 to April 1983, males aged 21 and over and females aged 18 and over: for April 1983 to April 1984, males and females on adult rates.
(b) Changes in average earnings between successive Aprils may reflect changes in the timing of annual pay settlements. Also, changes in average earnings may reflect changes in the composition of employment in terms of grades, etc., and do not necessarily correspond to changes in pay for comparable jobs.

Manpower Services Commission

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the total expenditure in 1984-85 prices of the Manpower Services Commission in each year since 1974, together with the percentage change in real terms over each previous year.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is as follows:

Financial Year	Expenditure at 1984-85 prices £ million	Percentage increase over previous year
1974-75	357·9	—
1975-76	699·1	+95·3
1976-77	971·0	+38·9
1977-78	1,072·0	+10·4
1978-79	1,139·8	+ 6·3

1983-84	1,848·5	+26·5
1984-85	2,051·5	+11·0

Notes:
(1) Expenditure at 1984-85 prices is derived using the Gross Domestic Produce deflator.
(2) 1974-75 expenditure does not reflect a full year of operations.
(3) 1984-85 data are provisional.

Expenditure includes the agency services performed by the Manpower Services Commission on behalf of the Department of Employment.

Youthaid

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report, the evidence on which he based his statement of 11 June Official Report, columns 816-87, about the factual accuracy of statements made by Youthaid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The evidence came from the hon. Member himself during the debate on 11 June, at column 816, when, quoting Youthaid as his source, he reported 50 per cent. of trainees from the youth training scheme as going into jobs. As the hon. Member is aware, the most comprehensive picture to date of the destinations of leavers from the scheme is provided by the survey of young people leaving between July and September 1984, when about half of all the 1984 leavers left the scheme. This clearly shows around 60 per cent. of trainees going into employment.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for 1983-84, 1984-85 and his latest estimate for 1985-86, the total sum expended on the youth training scheme; and if he will give the total sum expended on (a) grants paid to mode A managing agents, broken down into the administration fee, the training allowance, the trainee allowance and capital grants, (b) mode B1, and (c) mode B2.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is shown in the table:

‡ Other expenditure includes research and development, accredited centres and miscellaneous minor items.
¶ Outturn for 1984-85 is provisional.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Conditions Survey

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the housing conditions survey for Northern Ireland 1984 will be published.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive but I understand from the chairman that it is hoped to publish the report in September 1985.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Monetary System

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each month since the European monetary system was established the divergence of the pound sterling from the central rate of the European currency unit compared with that of the Norwegian krone, together with the relative volume and terms of trade each year for imports and exports of manufactures.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Norway is not a member of the EMS and the krone does not therefore have a notional central rate against the ecu. The table shows the market rates of sterling and the krone against the ecu, for the period requested.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing what effect on a recent date a pronounced movement in the pound sterling had on the central rate of the European currency unit and the divergence indicators for each member of the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Since 17 September 1984, sterling's notional central rate against the European currency unit has been £0·585992. The table shows sterling's market ecu rate and its divergence indicator in a recent week.

	£ ECU	*£ divergence indicator
17 June 1985	0·574080	−106
18 June 1985	0·571922	−126
19 June 1985	0·569682	−146
20 June 1985	0·570452	−139
21 June 1985	0·571337	−131

* The divergence indicator is calculated by expressing the ecu's premium or discount against sterling (ie the percentage deviation of sterling's market ecu rate from its notional central rate) as a percentage of sterling's maximum divergence spread (ie 1·91 per cent.).

The effect of movements in sterling on other countries' divergence indicators cannot readily be calculated. For purposes of calculating the divergence indicators of currencies that participate in the exchange rate mechanism an adjustment is made to eliminate that element of the change in the ecu's value due to movements of sterling, lira and the drachma outside notional 2¼ percent. bilateral margins.

Leasing Companies

Mr. Barron asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the Inland Revenue has decided that leasing companies may not claim decreciation allowance against leased central heating systems in council housing; and for how long previously such allowances have been able to be claimed.

Mr. Moore: There are restrictions on the capital allowances that may be given where machinery or plant is let for use in a dwelling house. These have applied for many years. How exactly the restrictions might apply to leased central heating in council housing depends on the facts of each case. If the hon. Member has a particular set of circumstances in mind and would care to send me the details I should be happy to look at the matter further.

CIVIL SERVICE

House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975

Mr. Favell asked the Minister for the Civil Service what arrangements are to be made to provide hon. Members with information about the amendments contained in the resolution tabled on 4 July updating schedule 1 to the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975.

Mr. Hayhoe: A detailed explanatory note is available from the Vote Office.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dispensing Doctors

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the relationship between the fees and allowances paid to doctors for dispensing National Health Service drugs and the costs incurred in providing that service; and what evidence has been given by his Department to the dispensing doctors review body on this matter.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: General medical practitioners as a body are reimbursed all costs incurred providing general medical services including dispensing drugs. Certain of these costs are directly reimbursed which means that each individual doctor receives reimbursement for the costs he personally incurred. Some of these directly reimbursed costs, such as the costs (less discount) of drugs and appliances, relate directly to the cost of dispensing. Others, such as the reimbursement of 70 per cent. of the costs of employing certain ancillary staff and cost of renting or purchasing practice premises, cover costs incurred providing general medical services and dispensing.

All other costs are reimbursed indirectly on an average basis through fees and allowances. These are set by the review body on doctors' and dentists' remuneration. They cannot build in to each fee and allowance the amount for expenses appropriate to that fee or allowance as this information is not available. It is therefore not possible to say what the relationship is between the payments to doctors for dispensing, which include a dispensing fee and an on-cost addition of 10·5 per cent. of the cost of the item dispensed, and the dispensing costs which they incur.

Our evidence to the review body has in the last two years concentrated on the steps which have been taken to establish the level of discounts obtained by doctors on their drug purchases to ensure that the direct reimbursement of the cost of drugs and appliances as nearly as possible matches the costs incurred.

Abortion Pill

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue guidance in relation to the testing of an abortion pill at Edinburgh university about the circumstances in which such a pill may be offered to pregnant women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not consider that any guidance is needed. The doctor responsible for this clinical trial has confirmed that it will be conducted in accordance with the requirements of the Abortion Act.

Dentists

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing for each of the last three years the gross annual earnings of National Health Service dentists in brackets of £10,000 up to £200,000 and over £200,000; and what was the highest gross earnings figure.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information we have readily available relates to the gross earnings, from which dentists have to meet their expenses, of dentists in Great Britain included in the calculations of the dental rates study group. This excludes assistants (whose earnings are included in those of their employers) and certain other dentists, for example those who have been on NHS lists for less than a year. The information is as follows:

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now publish the names and addresses of all family practitioner committee members.

Mr. John Patten: Family practitioner committee chairmen have been asked to publish locally the names of their committee members together with brief biographical details.

Dental Fillings

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now make composite dental fillings (non mercury amalgam) available on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am quite unable to understand the point of this question. Composite dental fillings are already available under the National Health Service.

Cumberland Infirmary (Domestic Services)

Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the decision of East Cumbria area health authority that the 10 per cent. bonus payable at the Cumberland infirmary must be withdrawn in any tender that staff submit for domestic services in the hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is for local management to decide the basis upon which the in-house tender is submitted. The in-house tender will then be compared with that of other tenderers, and we would expect the lowest bidder to be awarded the contract.

Food Additives (Letter)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost to public funds in postage and other distribution costs of sending departmental letter CMO(85)8 regarding food additives to all doctors in England, and other recipients, by first class post on 27 June; and why this was done so far in advance of the regulations taking effect on 1 July 1986.

Mr. John Patten: All doctors and pharmacists in England were provided with this information. 104,763 letters were distributed at a total cost of £32,542·62. The exercise was designed to assist health care professionals in the diagnosis and treatment of the small number of individuals who have adverse reactions to food additives. Some food additives have had to be specifically identified in ingredient lists since 1 January 1983. The Food Labelling Regulations 1984 which came into operation on 19 September 1984 require all additives (except flavourings which present special problems) to be identified fully in ingredient lists. Many manufacturers are already complying with these new requirements although they may, if they so desire, continue to comply with earlier regulations until 1 July 1986.

State Earnings-related Pension Scheme

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessments have been made by his Department during the last five years of the relative buying power of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Newton: We make regular assessments of the value of the average amount of the additional component to the state earnings-related pension scheme and its value against the rise in prices. The latest assessment is as follows:

	Average value of additional component £	Value against prices (1979 = 100)
November 1979	0·70	100
November 1980	1·08	134
November 1981	1·54	169
September 1982	1·88	197
September 1983	2·50	249

Notes:
1. All prices = General Index of Retail Prices
2. Figures are only available up to 1983

Elderly Persons

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what factors he based his decision to reduce the amounts of money which old people can claim from his Department when seeking places in homes; and what assessments he made of the effects which this policy would have on such claimants.

Mr. Newton: The new limits for residential care and nursing homes were set with reference to the information available to us on existing limits and charges, together with our determination on the amount we consider it reasonable for supplementary benefit to meet. We are monitoring the effects of the regulations closely.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of elderly people and handicapped citizens who have received financial support from his Department in each single year since 1979 for residence in homes or nursing homes and the range of the amounts of support which were granted to them during the same period.

Mr. Tony Newton: I regret that we have no information on handicapped citizens in this respect. The number of pensioners in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes together with the average amount of benefit paid and total expenditure on the basis of December figures is in the table.

Year	Number	Average amount of benefit £	Total spend on basis of December figures £ million
1979	11,000	18·04	10
1980	12,000	28·11	18
1981	12,000	36·30	23

Note: Average benefit figures include personal expenses but are net of other incomes such as retirement pension, which fails to be taken into account in supplementary benefit assessment. The total in benefit payments does not therefore give an accurate reflection of the movement in charges; it indicates the movement in that part of the charge that fell to supplementary benefit to meet.

Heating Addition

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated cost of the decision to provide automatic heating additions to the long-term sick and disabled over and above the cost of the heating additions already received by some of this group.

Mr. Newton: We estimate that this extension of entitlement will cost about £1 million in a full year.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the cost in a full year of the improvements in (a) family income supplement and (b) the housing benefit children's needs allowance announced recently; and what is the total net cost, allowing for the interaction between the two.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated gross costs in 1986-87 of the uprating improvements from November 1985 are £14 million for family income supplement plus £12 million for the increase in housing benefit children's needs allowance.

The full year FIS cost of £17 million would not be reached until 1987-88. I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply to the last part of his question as soon as possible.

Board and Lodging Rules (Exemptions)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases have been reported to his Department of inaccurate or inadequate information provided to claimants about exemptions from the new board and lodging rules; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We are not aware of any significant complaints about information to claimants. We are always concerned to improve communications and we have revised the standard letters sent to claimants aged under 26 to ensure that the explanation of the new rules is as clear as possible. I shall, however, be glad to look at any specific case where the hon. Member feels there has been a problem.

Blood Transfusion Service

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he intends to make available to the blood transfusion service to perform the proposed acquired immune deficiency syndrome tests for blood donors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We wrote to regional health authorities on 20 February 1985 asking them to set aside funds in 1985-86 for the introduction of the AIDS screening test in their blood transfusion centres. We would expect regional health authorities to find the money needed from within the £9,505 million made available for the hospital and community health services in 1985-86.

Tobacco Industry (Advertising and Sponsorship)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet reached any conclusions following the review of current voluntary agreements with the tobacco industry on advertising and sponsorship; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The review process is due to commence next week. Discussions will be confidential until they are concluded.

Benefits (Uprating)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to lay the orders and regulations needed to give effect to the uprating of social security benefits in November.

Mr. Newton: The following regulations have been laid today:

(a) The Social Security Benefits (Uprating) Order 1985 accompanied by a Report from the Government Actuary on the effect of the changes on the National Insurance Fund and

(b) The Pensioner's Lump Sum Payment Order 1985

(c) The Child Benefit (Uprating) Regulations 1985

(d) The Family Income Supplement (Computation) Regulations 1985

(e) The Housing Benefit (Increase of Needs Allowance) Regulations 1985

Other regulations will be laid next week.

Housing Benefit

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide the latest available estimates of the total numbers of recipients of standard housing benefits, divided between rate assistance and rent assistance; how many in each category have income above and below the needs allowance; if he will give the current year and full year estimates of the expenditure saving due to the increase in the rate taper to 13 pence and estimate of the number of claimants who will be adversely affected by the taper increase without taking account of the increase in the child needs allowance; how many of these losers will lose eligibility to rate rebates altogether; and if he will as far as possible break the above estimates down as between pensioners, working householders and others.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 24 June 1985, c. 335]: The latest estimates of recipients of housing benefit not on supplementary benefit relate to November 1985. The figures are given in table 1. The estimates take account of caseload changes indicated by the recent initial subsidy claims for 1985-86 from local authorities; the recently announced increases in benefit rates; the proposed increase in the rate rebate taper above the needs allowance and the real improvement in the dependent child addition to the needs allowance. Estimates of the numbers affected by the proposed rates taper change and the numbers who will not receive a rate rebate which they would otherwise have received are given in table 2. The estimated expenditure saving from the increase in the rate rebate taper change will be £20 million in a part year and £57 million in a full year.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange district health authorities in order of listing upon dividing the revenue expenditure, as contained in the 1983-84 annual statutory accounts of each district health authority in England by the population figures for each district.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 25 June 1985, c. 385]: The information is shown in the table. I should stress that comparisons based on crude population figures are not a precise indication of how the service provided by an authority relates to the needs of its district. In particular, they take no account of the use made of services in one district by residents of others, of the fact that certain highly specialised services are concentrated in particular localities, of extra costs associated with undergraduate medical teaching, of the payment of London weighting allowances, and of differences in the age structure and morbidity of the populations served. The comparison is further distorted by the fact that certain authorities provide ambulance services serving a number of districts, the expenditure in these cases being shown only in the accounts of the providing authority.

TRANSPORT

Wheel Clamping (London)

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans for or has had any discussions about privatising the wheel clamping operations in London.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have been asked to reply. A joint Home Office/Metropolitan police review team is currently examining the possibility of contracting out, under police supervision, both the wheel clamping and vehicle removal operations currently undertaken by Metropolitan police employees. My right hon. and learned Friend expects to receive the team's recommendations shortly.

ENERGY

Natural Gas Grids

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has given consideration to a link between the natural gas grids in Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland as part of an overall European gas grid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have not had such a proposal put to me. However, the Government's policy is that interconnections between the gas grids of Great Britain and other countries need to meet normal criteria of commercial viability.

Wylfa Nuclear Power Station

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Energy if any safety checks have been, or are proposed to be, carried out by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate on Wylfa nuclear power station; if he is satisfied with the existing safety standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by the Health and Safety Commission that the nominated site inspector from HM Nuclear Installations Inspectorate makes regular visits (at least one per month) to Wylfa to check compliance with the nuclear site licence. In accordance with the licence each reactor is subject to biennial shut-down for maintenance and inspection and cannot be restarted without obtaining the consent of the inspectorate. That consent is granted only if the inspectorate is satisfied that safety standards are being maintained. I am satisfied with the existing safety standards which are under continual review to ensure that operating experience and technical advances are put to best use.

Nuclear Installations (Safeguards Inspections)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will specify the dates in which (a) the International Atomic Energy Agency Inspectorate and (b) the Euratom Inspectorate have been informed that certain areas within some nuclear facilities are excluded from regular safeguards inspections as a result of national security reasons.

Mr. Goodlad: The United Kingdom Euratom IAEA safeguards agreement (Cmnd. 6730) was signed by the three parties on 6 September 1976. In the course of the negotiations leading to this signature the parties recognised that certain areas within some nuclear facilities would not be subject to routine inspection activities for national security reasons. This point is embodied in article 1*(a)* of the agreement. Euratom were made aware of these restrictions prior to United Kingdom accession to the treaty establishing the European Atomic Energy Community (Euratom) on 1 January 1973.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to the answer of 10 June, Official Report, column 299, he will define the terms transfers and holdings as they apply to plutonium figures reported to Euratom.

Mr. Goodlad: The plutonium figures reported to Euratom are for plutonium in shipments of irradiated fuel elements when they are transferred from the reactor storage ponds to the reprocessing plant. An annual report of fuel holdings is made to Euratom, giving the total number of fuel elements in the fresh fuel store, the reactor core and the irradiated fuel storage pond. The quantities of plutonium in these elements is not separately stated.

Sizewell Inquiry

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the date when the report of the inspector in charge of the Sizewell inquiry will be submitted to him; and if he will make it his policy to publish the report as soon as practicable thereafter.

Mr. Goodlad: The inspector has informed my right hon. Friend that he hopes to be able to deliver his main recommendations to him before the end of this year. It is the Government's intention to publish the report and make it available to the House, but the Secretary of State will wish to see it first and consider it before deciding on the publication date.

Sellafield (Plutonium)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much plutonium originating from the Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board Magnox reactors was contained in solid and intermediate level wastes at Sellafield on 31 March 1984.

Mr. Goodlad: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Member on 15 March 1985 at column 301.

Magnox Reactors (Spent Fuel)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the average burn-up (in MWd/te) of the spent fuel discharged from each of the Central Electricity Generating Board Magnox reactors for each of the fiscal years from 1977-78 to date.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by the Central Electricity Generating Board that this information could be provided only with disproportionate cost and effort.

Plutonium Exports

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all exports of plutonium for civil purposes by amount, country of receipt, and covering safeguard agreement in each case since December 1979.

Mr. Goodlad: Since the end of December 1979 a total of 1,500kg of plutonium in all forms has been exported for civil purposes. The countries to which plutonium has been exported in consignments larger than gramme quantities are as follows:

Belgium
Canada
France
Federal Republic of Germany
Japan
Switzerland
United States of America

Of this quantity some 1,234kg was derived from irradiated fuel imported and reprocessed by BNF plc under contract and returned to their overseas customer or to a country nominated by an overseas customer. Each country listed has a safeguards agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Butter Stores

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he proposes to implement the European Economic Community Council of Ministers' decision to bring the payment on butter stores back to 90 days; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and the Border (Mr. Maclean) on Wednesday 26 June 1985, at column 403.

Cow Fen, Cambridgeshire (Drainage)

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the grant-aided drainage scheme of the internal drainage board for Cow Fen at Swavesey, Cambridgeshire to commence; and when the contracts were signed.

Mrs. Fenner: I understand from the Anglian water authoriy that the tender for the pumping station and ancillary works was accepted on 21 June and that work is expected to commence on 8 July.

Fishing Offences

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many persons have been proceeded against for offences relating to illegal fishing at sea in each of the past five years; of what nationality these persons were; and what was the average penalty imposed.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985]: The number of prosecutions by vessel nationality, for illegal fishing are as follows:

Vessel nationality and number of prosecutions

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
British	39	58	54	47	36
Belgian	—	3	2	—	—
Danish	2	8	2	6	2
Dutch	—	4	1	—	1
Faroese	—	—	—	1	1
French	3	10	1	3	1
German	—	2	—	—	—
Irish (Republic)	1	—	2	—	—
Norwegian	—	1	—	—	—
Spanish	3	9	6	2	12

Average penalties cannot readily be provided for all the years but in 1984 it was £2,796.

Written Answers to Questions

CIVIL SERVICE

Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration

Sir Antony Buck asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether the Government accept the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration contained in its fourth report, Session 1983-84; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes. We plan to extend the jurisdiction of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration to include certain executive non-departmental public bodies and will introduce legislation in due course to amend the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration Act 1967. Although the Select Committee found no evidence of any significant maladministration by any of the bodies recommended for inclusion in the PCA's jurisdiction, the Government agree that there is a case in principle for including certain non-departmental public bodies whose impact on citizens may be as significant as that of Government Departments. The Government's response is published today and has been laid before Parliament as a White Paper, Cmnd. 9563. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

PRIME MINISTER

Kincora Boys' Home, Belfast

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister what representations she has received from Mr. Colin Wallace relating to investigations into the Kincora boys' home in Belfast; what request he has made in connection with giving evidence to the current inquiry headed by Mr. Justice William Hughes; what further action she has taken; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: It is not my practice to reveal the contents of correspondence sent to me by private individuals. I understand that, in view of the possibility that Mr. Wallace may have relevant evidence to give the committee of inquiry into children's homes and hostels in Northern Ireland, the committee approached Mr. Wallace through the governor of Her Majesty's prison, Lewes, with a view to an interview being arranged. Mr. Wallace has asked for certain assurances before the interview is held and I understand that these are being followed up by the committee. There are no grounds for any action on my part at this time.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Prime Minister which Parliaments of the other nine member countries of the European Community have so far ratified the proposal to increase the own resources contribution to 1·4 per cent.

The Prime Minister: The necessary procedures have been started in most other member states, but have not yet been completed in any member state.

TRANSPORT

Diesel Fuel

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will have discussions with oil companies and public transport operators about the quality of diesel fuel available for motor vehicles.

Mrs. Chalker: Officials from my Department are already taking part in discussions of proposed revisions to the British standard for diesel fuel. The existing standard is observed voluntarily by the oil industry.

Vehicle Testing (Regulations)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has made any assessment of the average cost to a small garage of meeting the new conditions of the vehicle testing regulations.

Mrs. Chalker: In view of the wide variation in size and layout of garage premises, it is not possible to make an average assessment.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to the reply of the Minister of State to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth on 2 July, concerning representations from garages concerning the new vehicle testing regulations, how many garages made representations; of these how many where in favour of the changes; and how many were against.

Mrs. Chalker: I have received approximately 170 representations, which equates to about 1 per cent. of the testing stations currently authorised. Most of these raised objections but some made favourable comments, particularly about the improved security arrangements.

Public Inquiries (Roads)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) on 26 June, Official Report, columns 425-26, about public inquiries on proposals for new or improved roads, if he will list the dates upon which each of the public inquiries referred to commenced.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows:

Route	Public Inquiry Opened
M1-A1 Kirkhamgate-Dishforth	April 1983
A1 Clifton-Stannington Bridge	November 1984
A 3 Liphook and Petersfield Bypasses	February 1985

Robertsbridge Bypass

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to reach a decision following the public inquiry into the proposed Robertsbridge bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: I hope to announce a decision following the inquiry by the autumn.

Spray (Lorries and Coaches)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he is making in developing methods of reducing lateral and rear sprays from lorries and coaches driving in wet conditions.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend made regulations last November which require new lorries and existing heavy trailers to be fitted with antispray devices conforming to the British standard BS AU 200, by various dates starting in May this year. These regulations are a first step, and my right hon. Friend will be ready to revise them in the light of technical progress. Buses are already fitted with comprehensive wheel guards and are not included in the scope of the regulations.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many road accidents in 1984 were attributed to wet road conditions, including lateral and rear sprays from lorries and coaches.

Mrs. Chalker: Details of accident causes and spray from vehicles are not identified in accident report. However, road surface conditions are recorded. Provisional figures show there were 81,827 accidents on wet or damp roads and 322 accidents on flooded roads in Great Britain during 1984.

Motorways (Drainage)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to ensure the better drainage of the carriageways of motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: Potential improvements in drainage are frequently considered and evaluated as part of the continuing process of developing better designs and construction methods. Currently, trials are in progress in an attempt to develop durable previous surfacings through which water can drain to the edge of the carriageways, thereby reducing spray from vehicles.

Marques (Investigation)

Miss Fookes asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether a date and venue has yet been arranged for the formal investigation into the loss of the sailing barque Marques; and whether a wreck commissioner has been appointed.

Mr. Ridley: Yes. The formal investigation will commence at 11 am on Monday 14 October 1985 in the New Continental hotel, Plymouth, and is expected to last approximately six weeks. The wreck commissioner will be R. F. Stone Esq., QC.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Judges (Retirement)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Attorney-General if he will list the dates on which each of the judges in the Court of Appeal, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, the Vice-Chancellor and the head of the Family Division of the High Court have to retire.

The Attorney-General: The respective dates are as follows:

	Latest retirement date
Court of Appeal
The Right Honourable The Lord Chief Justice of England	17 July 1993
The Right Honourable The Master of the Rolls	6 October 1995
The Right Honourable The President of the Family Division	6 May 1990
The Right Honourable The Vice-Chancellor	30 March 2005
Lords Justices
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Lawton	21 December 1986
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Ackner	18 September 1995
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Oliver	7 March 1996
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Watkins, VC	18 November 1993

	Latest retirement date
The Right Honourable Lord Justice O'Connor	28 December 1989
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Fox	8 October 1996
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Kerr	1 March 1996
The Right Honourable Lord Justice May	28 June 1998
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Slade	2 June 2002
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Purchas	19 June 1994
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Goff	12 November 2001
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Dillon	2 October 2000
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Brown	3 October 1999
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Parker	25 February 1998
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Croom-Johnson, DSC, VRD	28 November 1989
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Lloyd	9 May 2004
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Neill	2 August 1998
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Mustill	10 May 2006
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Nourse	3 April 2007
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Glidewell	8 June 1999
The Right Honourable Lord Justice Balcombe	29 September 2000

British Nuclear Fuels (Prosecution)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Attorney-General if he will prosecute British Nuclear Fuels plc. for contempt of court in respect of the exhibition staged by it at Windscale during the current trial of British Nuclear Fuels plc.; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I understand the question as referring to the static exhibition which has been maintained at the premises of British Nuclear Fuels plc. for several years. I am satisfied that it does not provide any basis for proceedings for contempt against British Nuclear Fuels plc.

British Telecom Shares (Fraudulent Applications)

Mr. Gould asked the Attorney-General what progress has been made in bringing prosecutions against those who made fraudulent applications for BT shares.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions expects to receive a report from the Metropolitan police shortly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Supervision Orders

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many specified activity requirements were included in supervision orders from (a) 1 July 1983 to 31 December 1983 and (b) 1 January 1984 to 30 June 1984;

(2) what proportion of offenders aged 14 to 16 years, inclusive, found guilty of indictable offences received specified activity requirements or suspension orders between (a) 1 July 1983 and 31 December 1983 and (b) 1 January 1984 and 30 June 1984;

(3) how many night restriction requirements were included in supervision orders between 1 July 1983 and 30 June 1984;

(4) how many charge and control conditions were made by courts between 1 July 1983 and 30 June 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information available to me, which may be incomplete for those requirements infrequently used, was published in Home Office Statistical Bulletin, issue No. 12/85 "The Sentencing of Young Offenders under the Criminal Justice Act 1982: July 1983—June 1984".

Prison Population

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been the average weekly change in the prison population since 4 January;

(2) what has been the average weekly change in the prison population since Easter.

Mr. Mellor: Between 4 January and 28 June, the prison population rose by an average of 244 per week, which is equivalent to about 160 per week after allowing for normal seasonal variation. The average increase since Easter—5 April—has been 145 per week; this figure is not greatly affected by seasonal adjustment.

Pucklechurch Remand Centre

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons investigation of Pucklechurch remand centre, completed on 6 August 1982, was not published until 27 June 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: This report was received in April 1984. It was one of a substantial backlog of inspection reports which had built up because of other pressing work—in particular, the Maze inquiry—and staffing difficulties in the Prisons Inspectorate during 1982 and 1983, when only five reports were received, and which were subsequently submitted to my right hon. and learned Friend during 1984, when 23 were received. Because of the increased number of reports requiring consideration, the interval between receipt and publication has been longer than we would have wished. Urgent steps are being taken by the Prison Department to clear the backlog.

Sexual Assaults

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate the number of sexual assaults recorded by the Metropolitan police for each year since 1979, and subsequent clear-up rates.

Mr. Mellor: Details of the numbers of sexual offences recorded by the Metropolitan police are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables"—volume 3, table S3.1 of the issues for 1980 and 1983—and for the latest year 1984 were published in Home Office Statistical Bulletin, issue 6/85—table 6. I understand from the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis that for all sexual offences the numbers and percentages of recorded offences cleared up are as given in the following table:

*Notifiable sexual offences recorded by the Metropolitan Police which were cleared up

	Offences cleared up (Number)	Clear up rate (Percentage)
1979	1,420	52
1980	1,420	51
1981	1,240	47
1982	1,240	44
1983†	1,450	52
1984†	1,610	53

* Offences cleared up in one year may have been initially recorded in a previous year.

† Excludes for comparability offences of "gross indecency with a child".

Forensic Science Units

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the future of forensic science units within the United Kingdom and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The forensic science service plays a vital role in the criminal justice system and, while my right hon. and learned Friend is always prepared to consider proposals for improving its economy, efficiency and effectiveness, he has no present plans to change the way it is organised.

Probation Service

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the annual cost of supervising a probation order in the financial year 1983-84;

(2) what was the annual cost to the probation service of supervising an offender under a supervision order in the financial year 1983-84;

(3) what was the average cost of supervising a community service order in 1983-84.

Mr. Mellor: The information is published annually in "Probation Statistics, England and Wales" and the latest available information is for 1982-83, published in table 12.3 of the issue for 1983.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Brittan: The position is as follows:

	Staff in post at 1 April 1984	Staff in post at 1 April 1985
Home Office other than Prison Department	9,369	9,252·5
Prison Department	27,077	27,360·5
Total	36,446	36,613

The increase in the Prison Department was due mainly to the recruitment of additional staff required to man new prison accommodation and for work arising from the reduction of the minimum qualifying period for parole.

Passports

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any limitations are imposed on the issue of British passports to applicants whose British nationality status falls outside the definitions of British citizenship, British dependent territories' citizenship and British overseas citizenship.

Mr. Waddington: No. Passports issued to other British nationals—British subjects and British protected persons—have the same period of validity as those issued to British citizens and are valid for travel to all countries.

Drugs

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Her Majesty's Government have ratified (i) the United Nations Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs 1961 or (ii) the United Nations Single Convention on Psychotropic Substances 1971; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The United Nations single convention on narcotic drugs 1961 was ratified by the United Kingdom on 2 December 1964. The Government intend to ratify the United Nations convention on psychotropic substances 1971 and we are now consulting trade and professional organisations on the changes that will be necessary to our domestic legislation before ratification can take place.

EC Passport

Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has of the cost of producing the proposed new European Community passport; and how this compares with the cost of producing the existing passport.

Mr. Waddington: The common EC format passport should cost no more to print and produce than the existing passport, the present cost of which is about £1·40.

Prison Population

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the prison population on 28 June.

Mr. Mellor: Forty seven thousand, five hundred and eighty two, excluding 51 in police cells.

Drugs (Forensic Analysis)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is currently the time taken by the police forensic science laboratories to analyse samples of products suspected of containing cannabis, heroin and cocaine.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information is not available on the time taken to complete analyses in different types of drug cases in either the six Home Office forensic science laboratories or the Metropolitan police laboratory. The average time currently taken in all drugs cases, of which cannabis, heroin and cocaine form the major part, varies as between laboratories from 17 to 32 days.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Air Pollution

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if work at the National Physical Laboratory on the corrosion of metals by air pollutants has been started.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

SEDCO 471

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the industrial potential to the United Kingdom of participation in the SEDCO 471 ocean deep-drilling programme.

Mr. Butcher: The ocean drilling project is likely to lead to some opportunities for the development of drilling equipment, submersibles, sensors and other equipment which may be of wider application. Contracts for these will, however, be placed throughout the participating nations and the industrial benefits for any individual nation are likely to be limited.

Tobacco

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing the value of tobacco products imported from West Germany in each of the most recent 24 months, respectively, for which figures are availble.

Mr. Fletcher: The information is as follows:

	Value £000s
1983

July	1,086
August	531
September	608
October	637

EC (Trade Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United Kingdom and Germany the increase in imports from and exports to other European Economic Community countries of manufactures between the first quarter of 1979 and the latest available quarter in terms of European currency units; and if he will provide corresponding figures for trade with the rest of the world.

Mr. Fletcher: The information is as follows:

Exports of Manufactures Increase from 1979/4 st quarter to 1985 1st quarter*

SCOTLAND

Salmon

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how often in recent years his fisheries protection service has had requests from the Northumbrian water authority to assist in the regulation of the north east drift net fishery; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: There have been no such requests. In 1984, a Royal Navy vessel that normally undertakes salmon patrols off south-east Scotland was diverted from time to time to patrol the waters off the Northumbrian coast. That will be repeated this year.

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the effect of the north east drift net fishery on the rod and net catches of salmon grilse and sea trout in (a) the rivers Tweed, Forth and Tay and (b) the rivers South Esk, North Esk, Dee, Don, Ugie and Ytham; and how this is affecting the runs and stocks of migratory salmonids in each of these rivers.

Mr. John MacKay: The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland estimates that the reported north-east coast fishery catch for 1983 of 77,277 fish included the following numbers of salmon and grilse returning to rivers in the stated districts:

Districts	Numbers
(a) Tweed, Forth and Tay	61,800
(b) South Esk, North Esk, Dee, Don, Ugie and Ythan	13,700

If one assumes an average rate of exploitation by all methods of about 25 per cent., the drift net fishery caused reductions in catches in the scottish rivers of 15,500 and 3,400 respectively. A substantial proportion of the balance would have escaped upriver to enhance the spawning stocks. Data for sea trout are not available.

Trees (Health Survey)

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when a full report of the results of the Forestry Commission's survey into the health of the nation's trees, announced on 12 March, will be published.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission plans to publish a report on this survey in mid-August.

Scottish Office (Staff Car Park)

Mr. Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many car parking spaces are reserved for Scottish Office staff at the St. James's centre car park, Edinburgh; what is the total annual cost; and how much is recovered.

Mr. Younger: Two hundred and four spaces are available to Scottish Office staff during working hours from Monday to Friday. Responsibility for the provision of spaces and the related financial arrangements lies with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. No charge is made to the staff who use the car park.

Edinburgh Dental Hospital

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his reply on 24 May, Official Report, column 583, whether the further meeting on the future of the Edinburgh dental hospital has been held; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Scottish Home and Health Department has arranged to meet the university, the health board, and the University Grants Committee on 23 July.

Bridges (Privatisation)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will make a statement on his policy towards the privatisation of the Forth, Tay and Erskine road bridges;

(2) if he has had any discussions on the possibility of privatising the three toll road bridges in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The Forth and Tay road bridge joint boards, which are the responsible authorities for these two bridges, have made no proposals to me concerning their privatisation. My right hon. Friend has no present plans to privatise the Erskine bridge.

University of Aberdeen

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, if he will seek to ensure that the future of the BSc (AGR) at the University of Aberdeen is not affected by the proposed cuts in research and development and advisory services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Mackay [pursuant to his reply, 5 July 1985]: The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland has issued a consultation document on the future of agricultural research and development in Scotland. A similar document on the future of the advisory services will be issued at a later date. Before decisions are taken, proper consideration will be given to any responses that are received on the effect of these proposals on agricultural education in Scotland.

THE ARTS

British Library (Cataloguing)

24. Mr. Fisher asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether the Minister for the Arts intends to meet the chairman of the British Library to discuss the computerisation of the British Library's cataloguing.

Sir George Young: My noble Friend has no plans for such a meeting.

European Declaration on Cultural Objectives

25. Mr. Murphy asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will make a statement on the implementation of the European declaration on cultural objectives adopted in 1984 in terms of the arts.

Sir George Young: The Government support the Council of Europe's declaration on cultural objectives.

Arts Council

26. Mr. Greenway asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts when the Minister for the Arts last met the chairman of the Arts Council; and what subjects were discussed.

Sir George Young: My noble Friend met the chairman of the Arts Council on 3 July, and they discussed topics of mutual interest.

Local Government Reform

27. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations the Minister for the Arts has received following the Arts Council meeting of 29 May above the level of Government arts funding in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Sir George Young: My noble Friend has received a small number of letters following the Arts Council's press statement about the level of funding and has said that he awaits the formal request from the Arts Council for funding for 1986-87.

Objects in Lieu of Tax

28. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he is in a position to announce changes to the provision for acceptance by the nation of pre-eminent heritage items in lieu of taxation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Consideration of the "in lieu" arrangements is in progress. A statement will be made in due course.

Northern Arts

29. Mr. Dormand asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what recent representations the Minister for the Arts has received from Northern Arts concerning the overall level of provision for the arts in the current financial year.

Sir George Young: My noble Friend has received no such representations recently.

National Heritage Act 1980

30. Mr. Latham asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will make a statement on the operation of section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980.

Sir George Young: The National Heritage Act 1980 enables Ministers to indemnify loans for exhibition purposes. The scheme is widely used and the rules governing it have not been changed.

ENERGY

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Energy, what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department reduced its manpower by a further 26 staff, from 1,098 to 1,072, in the period.

Emission Control

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Energy what new research is being undertaken in the United Kingdom supported by the Government, to develop new low pollution combustion techniques and emission control technologies.

Mr. Goodlad: Primary responsibility for developing new low pollution combustion techniques and emission control technologies rests with the industries concerned. The CEGB and NCB have substantial research programmes to investigate coal cleaning techniques, fluidised bed combustion and technologies for reducing emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxides. Vehicle manufacturers are also developing lean-burn engines which will reduce nitrogen oxide emissions.

As part of this overall effort, my Department is financially supporting two joint studies. The first, involving the CEGB and NCB, is a design study of a power station based on a pressurised fluidised bed combustor using both gas and steam turbine generators. The second, which also involves BGC, is investigating a combined cycle using the British Gas-Lurgi slagging gasifier. Both concepts are aimed at reducing emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxides.

Charles Darwin

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what finance he makes available to the Natural Environment Research Council for the study of tectonic changes by scientists on royal research ship Charles Darwin; and what is his policy on financing long-term research on tectonic change.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My Department does not fund any study of tectonic changes by scientists on royal research ship Charles Darwin. However, my Department has contributed to the international phase of oceangraphic drilling and has offered support to the new ocean drilling programme.

Redundancy Payments

Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of redundancy payments available for opencast coal industry workers under article 56 of the Treaty of Paris.

Mr. David Hunt: Article 56.2*(b)* of the treaty empowers the Commission to provide certain non-repayable aids towards tideover allowances, payments to workers temporarily laid off, resettlement and vocational training.

Such aid depends upon undertakings in the coal or steel industries needing permanently to discontinue, curtail or change their activities as a result of fundamental changes in the market conditions of those industries. It will be provided, on application by a member Government, only if that Government are themselves contributing at least an equivalent figure.

EMPLOYMENT

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current salary paid to permanent chairmen of industrial tribunals; when this was last reviewed; and what was the percentage increase.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The current salary paid to full-time chairmen of industrial tribunals (other than regional chairmen) is £28,500. This was last increased in 1984 following report No. 21 of the top salaries review body. The former salary of £26,750 was increased by 3 per cent. on 1 April 1984 and by a further 3·5 per cent. on 1 November 1984. In addition, a London weighting allowance, currently £1,300 is paid to chairmen serving in inner London. Chairmen's salaries have recently again been reviewed by the top salaries review body. Its report is at present being considered by the Government.

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Employment by how much the work load of industrial tribunals has been reduced as a result of the introduction of the new qualifying period.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The workload of industrial tribunals has not yet reduced as a result of the recent change in the qualifying period for unfair dismissal claims. The change applies only to those commencing a period of continuous employment on or after 1 June 1985. The effect of any reduction in case load will not therefore begin to be felt until June 1986, and the full effect will not be felt until the second half of 1987.

Leisure Industries

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment what advice his Department gives to the careers service on the job opportunities in the leisure industries.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Department's guidance to local education authorities advises them to seek to ensure that careers officers establish good relationships with employers and their organisations, trade unions and training institutions in order to build up detailed knowledge of occupations and working environments, employment opportunities and training schemes. This applies to all fields of work including the leisure industries. If my hon. Friend knows of any particular problem I would be pleased to hear from him.

Small Businesses

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Employment what specific measures he plans to undertake to ensure that his Department implements the proposals contained in the recent Department of Trade and Industry report on the scrutiny of administrative and legislative requirements in small businesses.

Mr. Peter Bottomley;: Since publication of the "Burdens on Business" report the Government has been considering action to carry forward this initiative and should be able to make its plans known shortly.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment in the following travel-to-work areas (a)

what percentage of those registered as unemployed are registered for work with the local jobcentre and (b) what further percentage it is estimated use the jobcentre self service system in Andover, Ashford, Aylesbury and Wycombe, Bicester, Cambridge, Crawley, Guildford and Aldershot, Harrogate, Heathrow, Hertford and Harlow, London, Medway and Maidstone, Milton Keynes, Oxford, Reading, Slough, Swindon, Watford and Luton, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: Those registered for work with the local jobcentres include a number of people seeking a change of employment and others who are not claiming unemployment benefit. Unemployed people are no longer required to register at the jobcentre as a condition of claiming benefit. Therefore it is not appropriate to express the number of jobseekers registered at jobcentres as a percentage of claimant unemployed. Information on registered jobseekers is only available for jobcentre areas which do not correspond to travel-to-work areas; and it is not readily possible to assess the number of jobseekers using only the self service facilities at jobcentres.

Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people under 25 years of age in Tameside have never had a job since leaving school.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 13 June 1985 there were 612 unemployed claimants aged 18 or younger in Tameside local authority district who had never had a job since leaving school. No information is separately available for those aged 19 and 20 years.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list all the different categories of persons according to willingness and ability to work who are included in the overall unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: The monthly unemployment figures relate to those claiming unemployment benefit, supplementary allowances or national insurance credits at unemployment benefit offices. It is a condition of receipt of these benefits or credits that a person be unemployed and capable and available for work. In addition to the statutory conditions, the Department of Health and Social Security also has arrangements for reviewing those who have been unemployed for at least six months.

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have registered as willing to work and given details of their skills and experience at the Hemel Hempstead jobcentre at the most convenient recent date; and what was the number of people registered unemployed for the purpose of benefit in the same area on the same date or most convenient date to the same date.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 7 June 1985, 937 jobseekers were registered at the Hemel Hempstead jobcentre. This figure includes some employed people seeking a change of employment and some unemployed people not claiming benefit. The number of unemployed persons claiming unemployment benefit, supplementary allowances or national insurance credits in the Hemel Hempstead jobcentre area on 13 June 1985 was 3,698. It is a condition of receipt of these benefits or credits that a person be unemployed and capable and available for work.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will show from the 1984 labour force survey the number of people in Great Britain who are economically active and (a) in employment, (b) unemployed and (c) others on Government training schemes, broken down (i) by ethnic origin and (ii) by age in five-year age bands.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information from the 1984 labour force survey is as follows:

(i) Economically Active Persons Aged 16 and over by Ethnic Origin: Great Britain Thousands

Ethnic Origin	In Employment	Unemployed	*Others on Government Schemes
White	22,147	2,642	53
Non-white, of which:	820	213	-
West Indian or Guyanese	221	66	•
Indian	313	56	•
Pakistani or Bangladeshi	83	44	•
Others*	202	46	•
All ethnic origins†	23,282	2,905	61

* Including African and mixed origin.
† Including those persons whose ethnic origin was not stated.
‡ Those persons on Government employment or training schemes who described themselves as employed or unemployed are counted as such; the remainder are in this category (apart from those on TOPS schemes who said they were neither working nor seeking work, who are classified as inactive).
• Sample size too small for reliable estimate.

(ii) Economically Active Persons Aged 16 and over by Age: Great Britain Thousands

Age	In Employment	Unemployed	*Others on Government Schemes
16-19	1,824	503	49
20-24	2,934	604	412
25-29	2,611	390	•

60-64	1,106	98	•
65+	385	24	•
All 16+	23,282	2,905	61

* Those persons on Government employment or training schemes who described themselves as employed or unemployed are counted as such; the remainder are in this category (apart from those on TOPS schemes who said they were neither working nor seeking work, who are classified as inactive).
† Aged 20 years and over.
• Sample size too small for reliable estimate.

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have registered as willing to work, giving details of their skill and experience, at jobcentres covering St. Albans and Harpenden at the most recent convenient date; and how many people were registered as unemployed for the purpose of benefit in the equivalent area at the same date.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 7 June 1985, 597 jobseekers were registered at the St. Albans jobcentre and 124 jobseekers registered at the Harpenden jobcentre. This figure includes some employed people seeking a change of employment and some unemployed people not claiming benefit. The numbers of unemployed persons claiming unemployment benefit, supplementary allowances or national insurance credits in the St. Albans and Harpenden jobcentre areas on 13 June 1985 were 2,233 and 668 respectively. It is a condition of receipt of these benefits or credits that a person be unemployed and capable and available for work.

Job Release Scheme

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to reduce the qualifying age for the job release scheme to 55 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: We have no plans at present to reduce the qualifying age for the job release scheme. The scheme, in common with all employment measures, is kept under review.

Disabled People

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what statistics are being collected to monitor the code of good practice on the employment of disabled people.

Mr. Alan Clark: A variety of statistics to monitor the promotion of the code of good practice is being collected by the Manpower Services Commission on a quarterly basis. These include the number of copies of the code issued; types of organisation to whom it was issued; and the number of visits to employers by the disablement advisory service. Monitoring of employers' first reactions to the code is currently being undertaken and some preliminary results should be available later this year. A full, in-depth evaluation of the code's effectiveness will be made after about two years.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the reasons for the lack of figures available on the number of unemployed disabled people after 1982; and if he has considered ways in which reliable statistics can be collected.

Mr. Alan Clarke: As foreshadowed in the September 1982 Employment Gazette, with the removal of the compulsory requirement to register for employment as a condition for the receipt of unemployment benefits in October 1982, it became no longer possible to collect statistics of unemployed disabled people on the same basis that had previously applied. However, figures on the numbers and characteristics of unemployed disabled people who choose to register for employment continue to be collected in jobcentres. These figures are published in the Employment Gazette each month.

The Government decided that in addition it needed to know regularly how many other unemployed disabled people there might be. The labour force survey would be used for this purpose, and first results were published in the article "Labour Force Surveys: preliminary results for 1984" in the May 1985 issue of the Employment Gazette. These new figures are based on a self-assessment of health problems and disability, and cannot therefore be compared directly with earlier series.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employers are subject to the disabled persons quota; of these what percentage meet the quota; what percentage has been issued with permits within the last 12 months and what percentage with bulk permits; and what percentage is below the quota but has not been issued with permits.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 1 June 1984, the latest date for which information is available, 36,680 employers were subject to the provisions of the quota scheme, of which 30·3 per cent. employed the full quota of registered disabled people. A further 51·2 per cent of this total were below quota but had been issued with permits during the previous 12 months, 49·9 per cent. with bulk permits. The remaining 18·5 per cent. of employers were below quota and had not been issued with permits. However, these were not necessarily breaking the law unless they had engaged other than registered disabled people in the period.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of disabled people who are in (a) section I and (b) section II who, during 1984-85, have been placed in employment by (i) disablement resettlement officers and (ii) mainstream advisers; and what these figures are as a percentage of total jobcentre placements.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is as follows:

Disabled people placed during 1984-85

	Number	Percentage
(i) by Disablement Resettlement Officers (as percentage of total jobcentre placements):
Section I	18,594	0·9
Section II	3,350	0·2
(ii) by Mainstream advisers (as percentage of total jobcentre placements):
Section I	26,153	1·3
Section II	291	0·01

In addition it is estimated that 23,400 disabled people (1·2 per cent. of the total) were placed through jobcentre self service facilities.

Income

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate for the latest available date the total known annual amount of income received by individuals and of this how much is paid (a) in wages and salaries to employees, (b) through other forms of remuneration deriving from employment, (c) from the profits of or remuneration of self-employment, (d) by way of interest, dividends and other benefits of investments, (e) in non-state pensions, annuities, and similar payments, (f) in social security benefits including the remission of rent or rates through housing benefit, free prescriptions, and similar remissions and (g) in any other way.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The most recent comprehensive information on the sources of gross income received by individuals in private households is given in table 21 of the report on family expenditure survey for 1983. A copy is in the Library.

Family Expenditure

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the most recent available estimates from the family expenditure survey on average expenditure of (i) all households and (ii) households with incomes below £150 per week on fuel, light and power, food, clothing and footwear, and durable household goods for the following household types (a) single person, (b) married couple, (c) married couple with one child, (d) married couple with two children, (e) married couple with three children and (f) three adult household; and if he will also update these estimates to May 1985 and November 1985 using the retail price index and Government assumptions or projections for price movements.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Aujeszky's Disease

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations his Department has received in the last 12 months on the question of Aujeszky's disease.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department received about 110 representations on this subject in the last 12 months.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Jopling: There were 103 fewer staff in my Department on 1 April 1985 as compared with 1 April 1984.

Register of Fish Farms

Mr. Onslow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether members of the public will have any access to the register of fish farms which he proposes to establish under the Diseases of Fish Act 1983.

Mr. MacGregor: Section 9 of the Diseases of Fish Act 1983 places very strict limits on the disclosure of specific information gained through registration, which would preclude the disclosure of such information to members of the public without the written consent of the persons by whom the information was provided.

Food Labelling

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he proposes to have with other European Economic Community Agriculture Ministers about the implementation of his proposals regarding nutritional labelling of foods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fenner: Copies of the statement of my right hon. Friend of 12 March together with copies of the draft guidelines on nutrition labelling have been circulated at official level to all member states. We will consider whether further action is appropriate when all responses have been received.

Agricultural Support

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing (a) the amount spent on agricultural support in the United Kingdom under the common agricultural policy and by national grants and subsidies and (b) the expenditure on agricultural support as a percentage of the gross domestic product, for the years 1960-61, 1970-71, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85, respectively.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

	Financial year
	1960-61	1970-71	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Expenditure on agricultural support under the CAP and on national grants and subsidies (£ million)	263	257	1,012	972	1,433	1,729	*1,780
Gross domestic product at current market prices (£ million)	26,180	52,786	237,373	259,803	283,855	305,708	327,000
Expenditure on agricultural support as a percentage of GDP (per cent.)	1·00	0·49	0·43	0·37	0·50	0·57	0·54

* Forecast.

Note: These figures exclude some other areas which might be designated as agricultural support—R and D, departmental administration, ADAS, animal health measures—which it is not possible to extract on the same basis as before.

European Community (Agriculture Budget)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the maximum amount expendable under the European Economic Community budget in 1986 on agriculture as a percentage of the total budget under the new rules; and how this compares with the actual percentage in each of the past five years and the current year.

Mr. Jopling: If the hon. Member is referring to the financial guideline which applies to expenditure from the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund, excluding fisheries, the Commission has estimated that maximum permitted expenditure under the guideline in 1986 will be 20·6 billion ecu. This represents 59 per cent. of the total expenditure the Commission intends to propose in its preliminary draft budget for 1986. The percentage shares of total budget taken by this expenditure since 1980 are as follows:

1980	69
1981	62
1982	61
1983	65
1984 supplementary and amending budget No. 1	67
1985 Budget	70

European Community (Farm Structures)

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about his plans to implement the European Community farm structures regulation No. 797/85.

Mr. Jopling: We have today laid before the House three statutory instruments which will implement this regulation. The Agriculture Improvement Regulations 1985 will, if adopted by Parliament, govern from 1 October the payment of farm capital grants for which part funding is available from the EC. Grants under these regulations will be paid to eligible farmers on a broad range of agricultural investments at basic rates of 15 per cent. in the lowlands and 30 per cent. in less-favoured areas; on tourism and craft works in hill areas at 25 per cent.; and on environmental improvements at 30 per cent. in the lowlands and 60 per cent. in the less-favoured areas. Young farmers under the age of 40 may qualify for increased rates of grant. The agriculture improvement scheme 1985 will from 1 October 1985 provide nationally funded grants for environmental works, including, for the first time, poultry waste disposal facilities, and, in fulfilment of a continuing Government commitment, for horticulture. The scheme also closes the agriculture and horticulture grant scheme 1980 to expenditure incurred after today and specifies deadlines for grant claims. In most cases, the deadline is December 1985, but for some land improvement works and for orchard replanting this is extended to 1988. The Agriculture and Horticulture Development (Amendment) Regulations 1985 amend grant rates under the Agriculture and Horticulture Development regulations 1980 for new applications received between now and 1 October. The new rates under these regulations are, in general, those which will apply under the new arrangements from 1 October.

WALES

Anglesey (A5 Bypasses)

7. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current state of the investigation by consultants into routes for bypasses around the five villages on the A5 on Anglesey; when he expects to receive a final report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The consultants are making good progress with their investigations and I still expect to receive their final report by the end of the year.

Housebuilding

13. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the actual percentage reduction in the net central Government expenditure on housebuilding in Wales between 1979-80 and the latest available date.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is not possible to answer the question in the form put by the hon. Gentlemen. Public sector housing is primarily the responsibility of local authorities and the Housing Corporation and it is for them to decide what proportion of their total resources to devote to house building.

Courtaulds Plant, Greenfield (Closure)

14. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on progress of Government measures to help the people of Delyn following the closure of the Courtaulds plant at Greenfield.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Discussions are currently taking place between my Department, the local authorities and the other agencies involved about the detailed allocation of planned resources including those I announced on 27 June. I hope that the local authorities can put forward final proposals within a very few days in order that the earliest possible start can be made.

Welsh Development Agency

15. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of the future plans of the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The future plans of the Welsh Development Agency are outlined in its published corporate plan, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Treforest Polytechnic

16. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many students in the polytechnic in Treforest received first class honours, 2A, 2B or 3rd degrees in marketing and marketing research in 1975, 1980 and 1984.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The polytechnic of Wales offers a post-graduate course in marketing. It does not, however, offer a first degree course in marketing or market research.

Hospital Development Schemes

17. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will enumerate those major hospital development schemes currently under way and at the planning stage in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Work is currently in progress on the following hospital projects:

Wrexham Phase I
Bridgend Phase I (Princess of Wales)
Morriston Phases I and II
Ystradgynlais Community Hospital
St. Tydfil's
Bryntirion, Llanelli
Prince of Wales, Rhydlafar
Llandudno Phase I

Seventeen other projects are in planning and are as follows:

Major Hospital Developments in Wales in Progress or in Planning

1. District General Hospitals in Planning
Llandough
Royal Gwent Phase VI
Morriston Phases III and IV—including regional burns and plastic surgery unit
Singleton Phase III
Neath General—Redevelopment
Ysbyty Glan Clwyd Phase II

Wrexham Phase II
Prince Charles Development, Gurnos
East Glamorgan—Development
Bridgend Phases II and III
University Hospital of Wales — Regional Cardiac and Regional Genetics Centre

2. Other Hospitals in Planning
Llanelli New Hospital
Tonna—Redevelopment
Llwynypia—Redevelopment
Deeside Community Hospital
West Mon Community Hospital (replacement of Valley Hospital)
Garth Angharad (Regional Secure Unit)

Labour Statistics

18. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of persons in Wales aged under 21 years who have been unemployed for over 12 months.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is not available in the precise form requested. In April 1985, for those aged under 20 years the figure was 6,647.

South Cardiff Redevelopment Scheme

19. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the progress of the South Cardiff redevelopment scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The next step is a decision on the inspector's report following the public inquiry into compulsory purchase orders for land needed for the development which will be available very shortly. I will announce my decision on that report as quickly as possible.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate local government expenditure in Wales for 1985-86; what restrictions, if any, he intends to impose on capital expenditure by local authorities; if he will review the percentage of capital receipts which can be spent by local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Local authorities have budgeted to spend £1,323 million on current account in 1985-86, about 1 per cent. more than the level of provision underlying the rate support grant settlement for the year. Allowing for the normal degree of shortfall on budgeted capital spending, and the tendency for budgets to understate the final level of receipts, the latest statistical returns suggests that local authority net capital spending in Wales in 1985-86 will be of the order of £265 million, about 5 per cent. more than the Government's control total.

In the light of this forecast I have no plans to restrict the level of capital spending during the course of the year, or to revise the proportion of receipts which authorities can use to enhance the spending power of their capital allocations. The situation will be closely monitored. If in the event there is an overrun on the cash limit it would be met from the reserve of £5 billion, and would not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Enterprise Trusts and Agencies

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to the location of all enterprise trusts or agencies which have been established in Wales and as to any plans for the creation of any new ones.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Twelve local enterprise trusts are currently operating in Wales at the following locations: Deeside, Delyn, Clwyd Fro (West Clwyd), Powys, Newport, Llanelli, West Glamorgan, Cardiff, Neath, Pembroke, Merthyr and Ogwr. There are currently plans to establish a local enterprise trust in the Rhymney Valley and to introduce the enterprise movement into the Cynon Valley.

Young Mentally Handicapped Persons

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those long-stay hospitals in Wales which have resident in them young mentally handicapped persons under the age of 16 years; and what is the number of such persons at each hospital and the date when that hospital last admitted such a person.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Provisional estimates of the numbers of persons aged under 16 years who were resident in mental handicap hospitals and units on 5 April 1985 are contained in the following table. Information as to the date when a hospital/unit last admitted a person aged under 16 years is readily available only in respect of admissions during the period January 1975 to April 1985.

MV Bridgeness (Oil Pollution)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what is his latest estimate of the numbers of seabirds, and the amount of coastline affected by oil pollution as a result of the disaster involving the MV Bridgeness;

(2) what is his latest estimate of the effects of oil pollution on the Welsh coast following the MV Bridgeness accident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The latest estimate given by the Nature Conservancy Council is that about 2,500 seabirds have been affected by oil following the MV Bridgeness incident on 16 June. More accurate figures will be available later as a result of continuing coastal surveys.

Oil from the MV Bridgeness had affected he shores of the islands off the South West Wales Coast to some degree. On Friday, 28 June, oil possibly from the MV Bridgeness had come ashore on beaches in Mid and the Northern half of Cardigan Bay and subsequently in Caernarfon Bay — extending from Borth in Dyfed to Treaddur Bay on Anglesey. Quantities are very small however except at Barmouth, where the groynes and sea walls have been contaminated. The local authorities are cleaning the beached oil as quickly as they are able and technical assistance is being provided by the Marine Pollution Control Unit of the Department of Transport. Aerial surveillance has shown that there is no further oil off shore.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

St. Helenians (United Kingdom Courses)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the number of St. Helenians at present attending educational, vocational and other training courses in the United Kingdom; and for what qualifications.

Mr. Raison: At present eight St. Helenians financed through the British aid programme are attending courses in this country. One is studying for GCE 'A' levels; and four are on vocational courses (midwifery, nursing, dentistu7ry, and medical laboratory services) leading to recognised qualifications. The remaining three are on special programmes in education and fisheries. In addition, in the current year, four students returned to St. Helena on completion of their courses; five more are due to arrive at the start of the next academic year; and a further 23 applications for training awards are under consideration.

UNESCO

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards technical support for selected national institutions with a view to developing prototype curricula for health education at school and related teacher training in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute in 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(2) how much the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards contracts with institutions for pilot activities aimed at introducing into literacy activities for young people and adults, and educational dimension relating to population problems and drug abuse prevention in 1984-85; and how much it intends to contribute in the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(3) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards (a) the organisation of training activities aiming to include in educational curricula and non-formal educational activities interdisciplinary content relating to drug abuse prevention, and (b) the publication of an appraisal of activities undertaken by certain member states in education and communication to combat the use of narcotics and prevent drug abuse in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(4) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards operational projects to further the inclusion in general educational curricula and in non-formal educational activities of subject matter relating to problems connected with the quality of life, the environment and nutrition education in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(5) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural organisation contributed towards the development of Palestine university institutions in the occupied Arab territories in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(6) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards consultancy services to assist in setting up a scholarship fund for students from the occupied Arab territories in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(7) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards further training fellowships for the teaching staff of universities in the occupied Arab territories, and to the supply of teaching materials and equipment for these universities in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(8) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards the supply of educational material and equipment for the education centres of African national liberation movements, and the organisation of seminars with a view to improving the training of the staff of the centres in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(9) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed to fellowships for students sponsored by African national liberation movements and students presented by the Palestine Liberation Organisation in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(10) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards the cost of printing school textbooks for the education centres of African national liberation movements in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(11) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation subsidised the publication of African poems and other activities decided upon with those responsible for education in African national liberation movements with a view to helping to preserve their cultural indentity in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisations will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87;

(12) how much the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation contributed towards informing public opinion about the assistance it provided in the implementation of education projects of African national liberation movements in 1984-85; and how much it is intended that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation will contribute for the years 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Raison [pursuant to his reply, 10 May 1985, c. 529]: As the information is rather detailed I wrote to my hon. Friend on 8 July and have placed a copy of the letter in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Anti-fouling Paint

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the nature of the research done in the United States of America which indicates that species diversity may be affected by the tributyl tin from anti-fouling paint; and if he will place a copy of the relevant papers in the Library.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand, from informal discussions at official level, that studies on behalf of the US Navy Department have been carried out on natural populations of marine organisms exposed to low levels of organotin compounds in large sea water enclosures; and that a selective loss of species occurred, indicating that one effect in the environment is likely to be a loss of species diversity. No papers are available but a report may be published soon and, if so, I shall arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the qualifications for the membership of the statutory joint committees for planning matters in Greater London.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Local Government Bill will require local planning authorities in Greater London to establish a single joint planning committee before the abolition date. Its membership will be for the planning authorities themselves to decide.

Housing Survey

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to alter the criteria for qualifications as unfit under the next national Department of the Environmental housing survey; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The 1986 English house condition survey will be designed to allow comparability with the results of the 1981 survey and it will measure stock condition against the same standard of fitness. We also hope to assess the effect of any revised fitness standard which may be adopted following current consultation on the proposals in the Green Paper on improvement policy, Cmnd. 9513.

Wild Birds

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the last annual report sent to the European Commission by his Department, as required by directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds, on the implementation of the directive in the United Kingdom, reported the numbers of (a) herons, (b) cormorants, (c) goosanders, (d) red-breasted mergansers, (e) grey geese and (f) barnacle geese killed in Scotland under a licence granted to prevent serious damaged to crops and so on; and if, in each case, it was reported whether the licence had been granted after a site investigation by Nature Conservancy Council officials.

Mr. Waldegrave: The last annual report on derogations under article 9 of EC directive 79/409 was submitted to the Commission last November and covered the calendar year 1983. It showed birds killed or taken under licence and the purpose for which each licence was granted. A copy of the report was placed in the Library.

The report does not show whether the Nature Conservancy Council carried out a site investigation for any particular licence. Current practice is to carry out such investigations when licence applications are received relating to herons and to barnacle geese on certain farms on Islay.

In other cases, monitoring is carried out on the basis of information made available to Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries staff in the course of their duties, including reports of action furnished by licensees.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Numbers of staff in the Department of the Environment, including the Property Services Agency, have fallen from 33,836 at 1 April 1984 to 32,791 at 1 April 1985, a reduction of 1,045 or 3 per cent.

Anglers' Weights

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to make a statement on the Nature Conservancy Council's findings on the subjects of anglers' lead weights and the lead poisoning of swans.

Mr. Waldegrave: I expect to make a statement very shortly.

Air Pollution

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much he expects to spend on air pollution research in 1985-86; and how this compares with expenditure in 1984-85.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department expects to spend about £3·4 million on air pollution research in 1985-86, compared with expenditure of £1·9 million in 1984-85.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the results of the Government's consideration of the need to set up a research programme into causes and control of reductions in atmospheric visibility.

Mr. Waldegrave: Visibility impairment is one of several consequences of photochemical activity in the atmosphere. These consequences are best considered as a whole. An expert group is being set up to review the evidence about the problem, both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, and the current relevant research, including that covered in my Department's own programme. I expect the group to report in two years' time.

Acid Rain

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for United Kingdom emissions of sulphur dioxide, how these compare with figures for the last five years; and what estimate he has made of the percentage reaching other countries.

Mr. Waldegrave: In 1983, the latest year for which figures are available, it is estimated that United Kingdom sulphur dioxide emissions were 3·69 million tonnes, representing reductions of some 31 per cent., 21 per cent. 13 per cent. and 9 per cent. on the 1979, 1980, 1981 and 1982 figures respectively. Estimates of emissions for 1984 will be available shortly.

As set out in the table to section III of my Department's memorandum of evidence to the Environment Committee, the co-operative programme for monitoring and evaluation of the long-range transmission of air pollutants in Europe —EMEP—has estimated that, in the period October 1978 to September 1980, some 28 per cent. of United Kingdom sulphur dioxide emissions were deposited in other countries. Work is in progress within EMEP to update the model on which this estimate is based.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps are being taken to achieve the Government's aim of a 30 per cent. reduction in sulphur dioxide emissions by the end of the 1990s.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government expect the downward trend in sulphur dioxide emissions since 1970 to continue in the longer term, through the expansion of our nuclear generation capacity, the introduction, as they become available, of new cost-effective technologies for cleaner and more efficient fuel combustion, improved efficiency in the use of energy, and further changes in the pattern of energy usage.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made by the building research establishment in preparing an inventory of the different locations, amounts of materials and types of buildings within the United Kingdom which are likely to be at risk from acid rain.

Mr. Waldegrave: This is a large task. Good progress is being made. We expect to have preliminary findings in the spring of 1986.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what stage has been reached in the discussions with the University of Manchester institute of science and technology regarding a programme on the interaction of air pollutants with building materials, with special emphasis on nitrogen oxides.

Mr. Waldegrave: A three-year contract has been let to UMIST. This work will supplement the BRE in-house laboratory-site work programme on the effects of air pollutants.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, following the results revealed in the initial survey by the Property Services Agency of atmospheric attack on buildings, the extended survey envisaged has yet been completed;

(2) what progress has been made by the Property Services Agency in monitoring for damage a selection of buildings constructed of different materials.

Mr. Waldegrave: The extended survey is covering buildings of different materials, and preliminary results will be made available to the House before the summer of 1986.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made with the study of damage to natural stonework in Bolsover abbey.

Mr. Waldegrave: I believe that my hon. Friend is referring to Bolsover castle—the Government's White Paper, Cmnd. 9397 incorrectly referred to Bolsover abbey —which is in the care of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission. Some of this monument's stonework has been treated successfully in the past with Brethane, but in response to some further discoloration, the Commission has installed monitoring equipment to measure the effects of atmospheric pollution. I shall ask the commission to inform my hon. Friend of the results of these tests when they have been completed.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what stage has been reached in the building research establishment programme for assessing the costs and benefits of preventing the avoidable erosion of historic and modern buildings; and when the programme is expected to be completed.

Mr. Waldegrave: To undertake a cost benefit analysis, it is first necessary to quantify the area of materials at risk and to determine the rates of erosion of materials. An inventory of buildings is, therefore, being carried out, and a programme of research on the dose response of building materials will commence shortly at BRE. Meanwhile, BRE continues to assess preservative treatments. The costing of benefits is especially difficult and it is, as yet, too early to say when the programme will be completed.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in the last 12 months in extending the Department's monitoring networks for nitrogen oxides and ozone.

Mr. Waldegrave: Financial provision for acquisition of equipment to extend the network has been made in the current, 1985-86, estimates. The monitoring techniques are sophisticated and each site costs some £50,000. The network has been planned and instrumentation is being acquired and developed, in order to commence establishment of new sites before the end of this year.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what need for additional research has been identified by the Committee on Air Pollution Effects Research, following the Environment Committee's report on acid rain.

Mr. Waldegrave: Additional research on the effects of low temperature stress on trees and on the increased susceptibility of trees to insect and fungal attack due to pollution is being undertaken as a result of the Committee's advice.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the results of the evaluation by the building research establishment of the extent of deterioration in stone samples exposed to air pollution in the vicinity of power stations.

Mr. Waldegrave: The samples have recently been returned to BRE. The analytical techniques are lengthy, and the completed analysis will not be available before the end of 1985.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research is being carried out into the damage done to organic materials by ozone and photo-oxidants.

Mr. Waldegrave: Studies of the degradative effects of atmospheric pollutants on plastics and organic surface coatings are included in the building research establishment's programme. The establishment is also undertaking a review of relevant overseas research.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Government have yet initiated their programme to determine mercury levels in fish originating from acid waters on catchments naturally rich in heavy metals.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department is discussing details of a limited programme with the freshwater fisheries laboratory, Pitlochry.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in planning a network of stations to monitor air pollution in rural areas, following the recommendations of the United Kingdom review group on acid deposition and the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: The primary acid deposition monitoring network will be in place this year; a secondary network is being developed from existing sites owned and operated by a variety of public authorities. The rural sulphur dioxide monitoring network is at an advanced stage of planning.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations on the subject of acid rain have been received from the West German and Scandinavian Governments in the last 12 months.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Prime Minister of Norway, Mr Willock, wrote to my right honourable Friend the Prime Minister on 2 October 1984, enclosing a joint declaration by himself and the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, Herr Kohl, concerning the preservation of clean air.

The Prime Minister of Iceland, Mr Hermannsson, also wrote to my right honourable Friend on 17 December 1984, enclosing a statement by the Nordic Prime Ministers on air pollution and acidification.

In the past 12 months, I have personally visited both Norway and Sweden, to see and discuss the effects of acid deposition, and my colleagues and I have also had a number of contacts with representatives of the governments of the Federal Republic of Germany and Scandinavian countries, where the subject of acid rain has been discussed.

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the stage which has been reached in the examination of the health effects associated with acid rain, referred by the executive body of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe Convention on Air Pollution to the World Health Organisation.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Nations World Health Organisation — UNWHO — has produced two interim reports for the United Nations economic commission for Europe's executive body for the convention on long-range transboundary air pollution. These reports relate to the direct and indirect effects of air pollution, including acid deposition, on human health. The UNWHO has been asked to update these reports for submission to the 1986 meeting of the executive body.

Emission Control

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in setting emission standards for medium and large cars following the EEC agreement in principle in March.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 3 July to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley).

Urban Programme (Bradford)

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide the total revenue and capital figures for the urban programme in the Bradford area for 1984-85 and that projected for 1985-86; and if he will break these figures down into sub-headings under the urban programme.

Sir George Young: In 1984-85, Bradford was originally allocated £1·71 million revenue and £2·87 million capital under the urban programme. In 1985-86, the figures were £1·66 million revenue and £2·92 million capital. The initial allocation for 1984-85 was assigned by project category as follows:

£ million

Project Category	Cap	Rev
Economic	0·718	0·274
Environmental	0·603	0·051
Social	1·549	1·385
Total	2·87	1·71

In the course of 1984-85, Bradford received an additional Urban Programme capital allocation of £706,000.

The breakdown of outturn expenditure for 1984-85 is not yet available and I am awaiting proposals from the city council for securing an acceptable balance of expenditure for 1985-86.

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of approved Bradford urban programme spending was related to ethnic minority projects in 1984-85; and what is the percentage projected for 1985-86.

Sir George Young: In 1984-85, approximately 15 per cent. of Bradford's approved urban programme expenditure of £4·58 million was allocated to projects of specific benefit to ethnic minorities. It is not yet possible to estimate the corresponding figure for 1985-86.

Rate Support Grant (Liverpool)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount of rate support grant will now be paid at the levels of expenditure currently set by Liverpool city council; how much has already been paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: As a result of Liverpool city council budgeting to spend £265 million in 1985-86, the rate support grant entitlement will be £50·273 million after holdback of grant. Including the payment being made today, the city council will have received £36·478 million.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the originally planned level of rate support grant for 1985-86 for Liverpool on the basis that the city council would budget to spend at his Department's target.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Had Liverpool budgeted to spend at their target for 1985-86, they would have been entitled to £139·597 million in rate support grant.

Home Loans

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the house price limits for the home loan scheme he announced on 28 June, at column 515, vary from the rate of increase in homes purchased by first time buyers; and if he will list the percentage increase in such homes and the limits for each region.

Mr. Gow: The home loan scheme's house price limits are set so that about two thirds of first-time purchasers could qualify. That was the criterion proposed by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) on 20 February, 1978 at column 1032, when he was Secretary of State for the Environment. The increases required in order to meet this criterion differ from the increases in average prices paid by first-time buyers. The table below compares the "Homeloan" scheme's house price limits with the average price paid by first-time buyers in the first quarter of 1985; and the increase in the "Homeloan" price limits as compared with the increase in average prices paid by first-time buyers in the year ending in the first quarter of 1985. Following is the information.

Region	"Homeloan" scheme house price limits from 20 July 1985	Average price paid by first-time buyers 1st quarter 1985	Increase in "Homeloan" scheme house price limits on 20 July 1985	Increase in average price paid by first-time buyers between 1st quarters of 1984 and 1985
	£	£	Per cent.	Per cent.
England
Northern	21,500	16,480	7·0	5·5
Yorkshire and Humberside	20,400	16,660	6·3	−1·6
East Midlands	22,100	18,340	8·3	10·1
East Anglia	26,000	22,400	9·7	13·8
South East:
London	38,000	32,970	14·8	7·9
rest of South East	33,500	27,680	14·0	7·9
South West	28,200	23,970	9·7	7·4
West Midlands	21,900	18,560	5·8	6·1
North West	21,700	17,690	7·4	0·7
Wales	22,700	19,680	6·6	4·6
Scotland	26,000	19,610	9·7	3·8

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many first time home buyers have received help under the Home Purchase Assistance and Housing Corporation Act 1978, each year since it came into force; and if he will give separate numbers of each region.

Mr. Gow: We estimate that the number of first-time buyers who have received help under the home purchase assistance—"Homeloan"—scheme are as follows:

	Number
1980-81	602
1981-82	5,500
1982-83	6,280
1983-84	4,200
1984-85	4,160
Total	20,742

I regret that separate numbers for each region are not available.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost each year of the operation of the Home Purchase Assistance and Housing Corporation Act 1978.

Mr. Gow: The net cost of the home purchase assistance —"Homeloan"—scheme comprises the amounts paid out in loans and bonuses, less the receipts from loans which have been repaid. The amounts are as follows:

	£ million
1980-81	0·42
1981-82	3·86
1982-83	4·24
1983-84	2·48
1984-85	1·6

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the assistance of £110 cash bonus and £600 interest free loans available to first time home buyers under the Home Purchase and Housing Corporation Guarantee Act 1978 has not been increased since 1979.

Mr. Gow: We have given priority to other ways of helping people into home ownership, including particularly the right to buy and our low-cost home ownership initiative. Between 1 May 1979 and 31 May 1985, the number of dwellings in owner-occupation increased by 1·9 million.

Charles Darwin

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to increase the length of the multi-channel seismic recording systems on royal research ship Charles Darwin from two kilometres to four kilometres; and what is the cost estimate.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply. I understand from the Natural Environment Research Council that in the present financial circumstances it sees no prospect of enhancing its multi-channel digital acquisition system by expanding the streamer from two kilometres to four kilometres. The cost would be about £400,000.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to allow deeper penetration by the airgun seismic source on royal research ship Charles Darwin.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply. I understand that the Natural Environment Research Council sees no prospect of finance being available in the forseeable future for the purchase of new airgun sources, which would allow deeper penetration.

Broad Street Station

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether at any time Broad Street station has been recommended for listing by an investigator; and what professional advice was received by the Department on each occasion that the building was previously considered for listing in 1971, 1975, and 1981.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985]: In 1971 and again in 1975, the City of London was surveyed for buildings of special architectural or historic interest by professional historic buildings inspectors. The resulting statutory list issued by the Secretary of State in 1972 and revised in 1977 did not include Broad Street Station since on neither occasion had it been assessed as of special interest. In 1981 on the evidence of further advice offered, the Secretary of State at the time was not persuaded to reverse the view that had previously been taken.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Argentina (Relations)

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is considering any early development in relations between the United Kingdom and Argentina; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The twin objectives of our policy are: to fulfil our commitments to the Falkland islanders; and to restore more normal relations between Britain and Argentina.

The question of sovereignty over the Falkland Islands is not for discussion. In our view, better relations with Argentina can only realistically be achieved by seeking agreement on practical issues. Commercial and economic relations offer a natural opportunity for progress of this kind. We have on a number of occasions made it plain to the Argentine Government that we are willing to discuss this subject. They have not so far responded to any of these initiatives.

We have accordingly decided ourselves to take a fresh step to promote improvement in this field. We are lifting, with effect from midnight tonight, the ban on imports from Argentina which has been in place since April 1982.

The International Monetary Fund has stressed the importance of increased trade for the recovery of the Argentine economy and for the resolution of its debt problems. That is important for international financial stability and for the consolidation of Argentine democracy. We have consistently played a constructive part in the relevant negotiations in the IMF and the Paris club. The announcement which I am making today will enable Argentina to recognise that if trade is to flourish, it has to be a two-way street, and so to lift its restrictions on imports from Britain. It will also benefit British industry, by restoring access to Argentine raw materials, and employment in the United Kingdom.

Argentina now has the opportunity to respond to our initiative and thereby to open the way to further steps towards more normal relations between Britain and Argentina.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the proposal being considered by the European Economic Community from Polish bishops for European Community financial support for a Church-sponsored programme for private farms and trade in Poland.

Mr. Rifkind: This is an interesting proposal, but in our view it would be wrong to direct limited EC resources away from higher priority calls for programmes in the developing countries, particularly the poorest and least developed. It is, of course, open to all members of the community to make national contributions if they wish.

South Africa

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people living in the Republic of South Africa have an entitlement to enter the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: This information is not available.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Renton: The number of Foreign and Commonwealth Office staff at post, including the ODA, was 10,031 at 1 April 1984 and 9,793 at 1 April 1985; an overall reduction of 238.

Sentenced Persons (Transfers)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in negotiating bilateral prisoner transfer treaties with Thailand, Peru and other countries which are unwilling to sign the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons.

Mr. Renton: Draft agreements have been exchanged with the Governments of Thailand and Peru, the terms of which are now the subject of negotiation. The United Kingdom has no plans for the moment to enter into bilateral arrangements for the transfer of prisoners with any other state, but when the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons comes into force for the United Kingdom on 1 August, transfers will be possible with a number of other countries.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British prisoners serving sentences abroad on the most recent convenient date would be eligible for transfer to the United Kingdom under the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons; and in which countries they are imprisoned.

Mr. Renton: The Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons will come into force for the United Kingdom on 1 August and from that date transfers will be possible with France, Spain, Sweden and the United States of America and from 1 September with Canada.

As at 4 July, the numbers of prisoners who could be considered for transfer to the United Kingdom are as follows:

	Numbers
France	49
Spain	35
Sweden	15
United States of America	35
Canada	1

Ascension Island (Feral Cats)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any progress has been made in reducing the numbers of feral cats on Ascension Island.

Mr. Renton: No estimate of numbers is available, but efforts to reduce the feral cat population are continuing.

CERN

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to seek to amend the treaty obligations of the United Kingdom regarding CERN; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no such plans.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the costs of implementing Sir John Kendrew's proposals regarding future United Kingdom participation in CERN; and how these costs are made up.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply. The report of the review group chaired by Sir John Kendrew was addressed to the Advisory Board for the Research councils and the Science and Engineering Research Council, whose advice my right hon. Friend awaits. That advice will no doubt contain estimates of the implications of certain options, including that favoured by the Kendrew group, related to the United Kingdom's participation in CERN.

Falkland Islands (Fishing)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what countries are currently engaged in fishing in the existing 150 mile protection zone of the Falkland Islands; and whether he has any information as to the estimated quantities and value of the total catch in 1984 and in 1985 to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Renton: Fishing and support vessels observed in the Falkland Islands protection zone in recent months were registered in Poland, the Soviet Union, Spain, Japan, Taiwan, Korea, the German Democratic Republic, Bulgaria and Liberia. The latest estimates available to us suggest that the fish catch within the protection zone was roughly 185,000 tonnes in 1984 and 75,000 tonnes in 1985, up to mid-June. The precise composition of the catch is not known, and values are subject to market fluctuations. It is not therefore possible to make any meaningful estimate of the total value of the catch.

Decade for Women Conference

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy that the national statement to be presented at the end of the United Nations decade for women conference in Nairobi is published and publicised in the United Kingdom before the conference starts on 13 July.

Mr. Renton: No. It is not usual for the texts of ministerial speeches of this sort to be made available in advance. A copy of the statement will, however, be placed in the Library of the House when it is delivered.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

European University Institute

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is (a) the total running cost of the European University Institute, (b) the number of (i) teaching and (ii) research staff employed and (c) the level of pay for members of staff by grade at current rates of exchange in each of the last five years.

Mr. Brooke: Details of the total approved budget of the institute and of the number of teaching and research staff employed in each of the last five years are given in the tables below. All staff at the institute are employed and paid by reference to the grading structure established for officials and other servants of the European Communities. The salary scales are those agreed annually by the EC member states, using the weighting applicable to Italy, but the information requested at (c) on the level of pay could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

a. Total approved Budget

1985	12.305	†2.530	4·864

* The 1983 Budget included for the first time a substantial contribution (Lit 1,461 million) from the European Communities Budget in support of the Institute's research programme.

† For 1985 the rate used is that current at the time of this reply rather than an average.

* From March 1984, one-year Jean Monnet Fellowships have been offered to enable highly qualified academics to pursue individual research within the scope of the Institute's research programmes. Their costs are covered by the EC contribution to the Institute's Budget.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evaluation has been made of the amount of teachers' time required to run, supervise and mark the proposed new general certificate of secondary education examination; what is the estimated cost of introducing the new examination; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The general criteria for the GCSE provide that syllabuses and methods of assessment should not make unreasonable demands on human or financial resources. The programme of in-service training in preparation for the new examinations will make some extra demand on resources: the Government has consequently agreed that £6 million of expenditure on this programme should be supported under the in-service teacher training grants scheme. The Government has also committed itself, subject to Parliament's approval, to provide the Secondary Examinations Council with additional grant of £860,000 which will be used partly to finance the production and dissemination of teacher manuals and videos and partly as a contribution towards the costs of the groups in providing subject experts to lead the in-service training seminars.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of gross domestic product is spent on education in primary and secondary schools in each member state of the European Community, the United States of America and Japan.

Sir Keith Joseph: The available information is as follows:

Percentage of gross national product on public sector 1st and 2nd level education

Tourism Subjects

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students will have completed courses of further education in tourism-related subjects, at the end of the current term.

Sir Keith Joseph: It is not possible to answer my hon. Friend's question without a definition of which subjects should be included. Many subject areas such as Hotel and Catering or Languages can be thought of as "tourism-related. In November 1983, the latest year for which information is available, there were 613 students on the final year of a further education course in England, studying for qualifications specifically in Tourism or Travel Agency.

Physical Science Graduates

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of physical science graduates from universities and polytechnics have opted to undertake teacher training over the past five years; and how this percentage is changing.

Mr. Dunn: Figures for the most recent five-year span and in the most readily available form are as follows:

Graduates in Biological and Physical Sciences: England and Wales

	Numbers graduating (1)	Numbers entering Teacher training (2)	(2) as percentage of (1) in previous year
1978-79	13,880	—	—
1979-80	14,740	1,930	13·9
1980-81	16,080	2,280	15·5
1981-82	16,840	2,260	14·0
1982-83	16,690	2,260	13·4
1983-84	—	2,050	12·3

Notes:

1. Biological and physical sciences include all natural sciences and mathematics. Graduates from public sector colleges validated by universities are excluded.
2. Columns 1 and 2 include graduates from FE institutions other than polytechnics (who cannot be separately distinguished).
3. All figures relate to home students only.
4. Column 1 figures relate to students awarded their degree at the end of the appropriate year; column 2 figures relate to those on the first year of their course in the subsequent academic year.
5. All figures have been rounded to the nearest 10.

Overseas Students

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the optimum number and percentage of overseas students that the Government would expect to see in British institutions of higher and further education in each of the next 10 years.

Mr. Brooke: The proportion of overseas students varies widely from institution to institution. My right hon. Friend would not wish to suggest an optimum proportion for any institution or for higher and further education as a whole.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the figure of 11 per cent., and rising in relation to the proportion of overseas students, given in his statement on the Green Paper, referred to university students only; and if he will give comparable percentage figures for non-university higher education and non-advanced further education.

Mr. Brooke: In response to an intervention from my hon. Friend on 21 May 1985 at column 865, my right hon. Friend said that the proportion of overseas students here was now 11 per cent. However, that figure related to the proportion of overseas students in the universities alone: in 1983-84, the number of students from abroad (including those from other European Community countries), as a proportion of all full-time and sandwich students in universities in Great Britain had increased from 10·5 per cent. for the previous academic year to 11·1 per cent. in 1983-84. The corresponding figure for public sector higher education was 5 per cent. and that for higher education in Great Britain overall was 8·2 per cent. The figure for non-advanced further education was 2 per cent.

Higher Education

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the numbers, both in absolute terms and expressed as a percentage of the relevant age group, going on to university or to degree term courses in central institutions, further education colleges or colleges of education or in other similar education institutions in (a) Scotland, (b) England and (c) Wales, for each of the last 20 years, giving figures for each year; and what percentage received degrees.

Mr. Brooke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Teachers' Salaries

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish figures to show the percentage increase in teachers' salaries in cash and real terms (a) from the implementation of the Houghton award to April 1979, (b) from the implementation of the Houghton award to April 1984, (c) from April 1979 to April 1984 and (d) from April 1979 to April 1985, assuming payment of the award currently offered by teachers' employers, in each case both allowing for and not allowing for incremental rises.

Sir Keith Joseph: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Deep Earth Sciences

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science why from 1 October the United Kingdom will cease to be a candidate member of the Joint Oceanographic Deep Earth Sciences Committee with the United States of America, Canada, West Germany, France and Japan; and if he will make a statement on the British subscription.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the period during which the United Kingdom is allowed candidate membership of the Joint Oceanographic Institutions for Deep Earth Sampling is not permitted to be extended beyond 30 September 1985. The United Kingdom's subscription is paid through the Natural Environment Research Council, which is continuing to make efforts to secure contributions from a number of sources, including companies in the oil and mining sectors, to enable the United Kingdom to afford the cost of full membership from 1 October 1985.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rates

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the policy of the Department of the Environment rating division with regard to cases where summonses for the non-payment of rates have been issued wrongly; and whether those summoned have to pay the cost of the summons;

(2) how many summonses for the non-payment of rates have been issued in Northern Ireland by the rating division of the Department of the Environment in each of the last four years;

(3) how many summonses issued in Northern Ireland for the non-payment of rates by the Department of the Environment rating division in each of the last five years were subsequently withdrawn; and what were the principal reasons for these withdrawals.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the replies I gave on 15 May 1985 at column 148.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the number of people, by convenient district unit, in Northern Ireland who are in receipt of housing benefit, indicating how many of these are also receiving supplementary benefit and how many are pensioners.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The available information as at 15 March is shown in the following table:

District council area	Number of persons in receipt of housing benefit*	Number of housing benefit recipients also in receipt of supplementary benefit*

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the number of people, by convenient district unit, in Northern Ireland, who are in receipt of housing benefit supplement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is shown in the following table:

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what figures are available to indicate the number of households in receipt of family income supplement in the areas served by each of Northern Ireland's social security offices.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the form requested, as family income supplement is administered centrally and not by social security Offices. The number of recipients on 3 June 1985 was 14,569.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if Her Majesty's Government will make arrangements to allow young unemployed people who go abroad on a youth service scheme to claim benefit again, on their return, without having to make a full fresh claim; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: There is a statutory requirement that persons wishing to receive benefit should make a claim and, in the absence of evidence that the existing arrangements are not satisfactory, it would be inappropriate to modify them in the circumstances mentioned.

Youth Service

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if Her Majesty's Government will take steps to introduce a weekly grant or allowance at least of equal value with a training allowance for young people who go abroad as part of a youth exchange, educational holiday or voluntary work programme organised through the youth service and who otherwise have no income for the duration of their time abroad.

Mr. Scott: The Government have no plans to introduce an allowance for young people who go abroad as part of a programme organised through the youth service.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if her Majesty's Government will modify the application of regulations concerning availability for work in relation to young people who go abroad on a youth exchange scheme, educational visit or voluntary work programme organised through the youth service in relation to their qualification for social security benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is a well established feature of the social security system that entitlement to benefits for unemployed persons is conditional on their being available for work and it is not proposed to modify the existing regulations in this respect. Supplementary benefit is not payable to unemployed persons while abroad, but, in certain circumstances, entitlement to unemployment benefit can be retained during absence in an EC member state.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the role of the youth service in Northern Ireland with particular regard to the role of summer schemes organised by the service, and the value of such schemes to young people.

Mr. Scott: The youth service in Northern Ireland plays an important part in informal education. The programmes are varied and include recreation, residential experience, adventure training, social activities and counselling.

Special summer schemes based in school premises were in the past organised during the holiday period. Increased pressures on financial resources required these to be replaced by an extention of normal youth service provision during July and August, and this redistribution of resources has the merit of attracting young people from the full youth service age range and maximises the use of custom-built youth centres.

Scallop Beds

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply of 1 July, what is the result of the monitoring of the scallop beds adjacent to the Northern Ireland coast since 1 June; and if he is still satisfied that there is no threat to these beds from boats based outside Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: The monitoring indicates that the fishing effort to date is not excessive given the present state of the scallop stocks.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC Budget

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer further to his reply dated 14 May, Official Report, columns 84-5, concerning the maximum level of spending under the European Economic Community budget on agriculture, whether he will publish in the Official Report (i) the percentage of the total budget represented by the figure of 20·65 billion ecu, (ii) the comparable figures for 1984 and 1985, (iii) the increase in the own resources base used in the calculation and (iv) an explanation of what is meant by a comparable basis and how this affects the calculation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission has now revised its estimate of the financial guideline for 1986 down from 20·650 billion ecu to 20·619 billion ecu. This figure is a ceiling and the Commission has proposed in its key figures for the preliminary draft budget for 1986 expenditure on FEOGA guarantee of 20·442 billion ecu excluding the costs of enlargement. This represents 64 per cent. of its proposal for total expenditure in a Community of ten. This proportion may be different in the adopted budget for 1986 depending on decisions taken by the Council and European Parliament during the budgetary procedure. The equivalent proportions in the budgets for 1984 and 1985 were 67 per cent. and 70 per cent. respectively. However, the proportion for 1984 is not strictly comparable with those for 1985 and 1986 because of the different treatment of the United Kingdom's rebates which in 1984 were on the expenditure side.

The guideline figure for 1986 is based on an estimate that the own resources base will grow by 10·85 per cent. between the average of 1984 and 1985 and 1986. Article 2 of the budget discipline conclusions requires calculations to be made on a comparable basis in order to avoid the operation of the guideline being distorted by such things as a change in the definition of agricultural expenditure or the proposed increase in the VAT ceiling from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. This requirement ensures that the financial guideline grows at no more than the rate of growth of a consistently defined own resources base.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Hayhoe: Manpower numbers in the Treasury (including CISCO) were reduced from 3,671 at 1 April 1984 to 3,393 by 1 April 1985.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many traders have been prosecuted for failing to notify Her Majesty's Customs and Excise when their taxable turnover for value added tax purposes exceeds the exemption limit.

Mr. Lawson: Twenty-two in 1984-85.

Mr. Walters asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what representations he has received advocating the removal of value added tax charged on meals supplied by local authority school kitchens to voluntary senior citizens' luncheon clubs; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received advocating the elimination of the taxation differences between the sale of meals by local authorities to voluntary bodies and the meals on wheels service; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what is the estimated revenue in a full year from the value added tax charged on meals supplied by local authority school kitchens to voluntary senior citizens' luncheon clubs; and what is the estimated cost of collecting this revenue.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury Ministers have received a few letters. The Meals on Wheels service provided by local authorities as a statutory function under the National Assistance Act 1948 (Amendment) Act 1962 is outside the scope of VAT. But supplies of meals by local authorities to voluntary bodies are subject to the tax in the same way as similar supplies made by private sector caterers. This accords with the principle that supplies made by local authorities should be treated in the same way as similar supplies made in the course of business by the private sector, and an exception in this case would not be justified. I regret that sufficiently detailed information is not available upon which to base an estimate of either the revenue received or the cost of collection.

Pensions

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will establish a separate cost of living index reflecting the spending patterns of retirement pensioners for the purposes of assessing future adjustments in the retirement pension; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC Rebates

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many member states of the European Economic Community have taken the necessary legislative or other steps to permit their respective Treasuries to make payments to the European Economic Community in terms of the undertaking of the Council on 23 April designed to enable the United Kingdom's 1985 rebate to be paid; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many member states of the European Economic Community have now paid to the European Economic Community the sums which they were committed to pay in terms of the undertaking of the Council on 23 April designed to enable the United Kingdom's 1985 rebate to be paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have replies as soon as possible.

Lloyd's Syndicates (Taxation)

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax inspectors are employed in the special team responsible for aspects of Lloyd's syndicates; how many of them are concerned with investigating reinsurance arrangements; when they expect to complete this investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to the answer of 16 May at columns 189-90, he will provide the figures for mortgage interest tax relief for 1983-84 onwards, excluding the estimated cost of relief in respect of mortgages previously under the option mortgage scheme.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 17 June 1985, c. 28]: From April 1983 the arrangements for paying mortgage interest relief at source (MIRAS) subsumed the option mortgage scheme. From the available information, it is not possible to distinguish the cost of relief for those mortgages which were previously under the option mortgage scheme. But the hon. Member may find it helpful to have the costs of the option mortgage scheme for years before the introduction of MIRAS, expressed at 1984-85 prices. These are shown in the following table, together with the cost of mortgage interest relief distinguishing, for 1983-84 and 1984-85, the provision on class XIII Vote 7 for mortgage interest relief at source given to non-taxpayers.

*£ million at 1984-85 prices

DEFENCE

Royal Ordnance plc (Design Rights)

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Defence why disclosure in full of the design rights transferred to Royal Ordnance plc by the scheme made under section 1 of the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Act 1984 would be contrary to national security and to the commercial interests of Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Butler: For those few cases where national security is concerned, it would not be appropriate or in line with normal practice to give detailed justifications for non-disclosure. In the vast majority of cases where detailed information has not been published, it is because, when taken together, it would be commercially sensitive and its disclosure could place Royal Ordnance plc at a disadvantage against its competitors. No other commercial company would publish such information. Royal Ordnance plc is subject to the normal Patent Office rules governing patents applications and registered designs and appropriate details of these were set out in the published scheme.

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will identify those design rights transferred to Royal Ordnance plc by a scheme made under section 1 of the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Act 1984, publication of which he does not consider to be contrary to national security or the commercial interests of Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Butler: A copy of the scheme, and the lists referred to in the scheme, made under section 1 of the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Act 1984 was laid before the House on 9 January 1985. The published scheme contains all the information, disclosure of which would not be contrary to national security or the commercial interests of Royal Ordnance plc.

Submarine Deployment

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to support in principle proposals for a sanctuary agreement banning hostile submarine deployment adjacent to the coastlines of the United States of America and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Stanley: The British Government believe the highest priority should be given to reducing the levels of nuclear weapons and fully supports US efforts at the Geneva negotiations to do so. A sanctuary agreement such as that referred to would not reduce the level of forces, and would pose complex verification issues.

Royal Naval Fleetlands, Gosport

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future of Royal Naval Fleetlands, Gosport.

Mr. Lee: The Royal Naval aircraft yard, Fleetlands, at Gosport will continue to have a substantial programme of helicopter repair, overhaul and modification work, for all three services, for the foreseeable future. As elsewhere in the defence support area, we are seeking to improve efficiency at Fleetlands if we can. To this end, a number of studies are currently in hand to establish whether it would be operationally acceptable and financially acceptable to contract out certain ancillary services at the yard. There will be full consultation with the trade unions concerned before any decisions are reached.

Medical Services

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many military personnel have been employed in the provision of medical services to the Army in each year since 1979;

(2) how many military personnel have been employed in the provision of medical services to the Royal Navy in each year since 1979;

(3) how many military personnel have been employed in the provision of medical services to the Royal Air Force in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: I refer my hon. Friend to the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985 (Part 2)". The information requested is shown on page 45 in table 6.2.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many civilian personnel have been employed in the provision of medical services to the Army in each year since 1979;

(2) how many civilian personnel have been employed in the provision of medical services to the Royal Navy in each year since 1979;

(3) how many civilian personnel have been employed in the provision of medical services to the Royal Air Force in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: The following figures are for civilian personnel employed in the provision of medical services to the three services on 1 April in each of the years 1982-1985 inclusive. The information is not readily available for previous years and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

	1982	1983	1984	1985
Army	421	400	387	396
Navy	133	143	130	119
RAF	164	125	123	105

The figures comprise medical nursing and specialist staffs only; they do not include ancillary or administrative staffs.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what has been the cost to the defence budget of the provision of medical services to the Army in each year since 1979;

(2) what has been the cost to the defence budget of the provision of medical services to the Royal Air Force in each year since 1979;

(3) what has been the cost to the defence budget of the provision of medical services to the Royal Navy in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Estimates provision for the medical services of the Army, Navy and Royal Air Force was:

£ million

	Army	Navy	RAF	Total
1979-80*	—	—	—	150·0
1980-81*	—	—	—	191·0
1981-82*	—	—	—	212·0
1982-83*	—	—	—	207·0
1983-84	112·5	51·0	47·5	211·0
1984-85	120·5	58·1	51·9	230·5
1985-86	120·0	55·5	52·5	228·0

* Estimate provisions for these financial years is not available broken by Service.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the facilities which provide medical services for Army personnel in the Aldershot area;

(2) if he will list the facilities which provide medical services for Army personnel in the Camberley area;

(3) if he will list the facilities which provide medical services for Army personnel in the Frimley area.

Mr. Lee: Primary and secondary medical care for Army personnel in the Frimley, Aldershot and Camberley areas of the Army's south-east district is provided by facilities and personnel at Army medical centres within the district and by the Cambridge military hospital, Aldershot respectively.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what has been the cost to the defence budget of the provision of medical services for Army personnel in the Aldershot area in each year since 1979;

(2) what has been the cost to the defence budget of the provision of medical services for Army personnel in the Camberley area in each year since 1979;

(3) what has been the cost to the defence budget of the provision of medical services for Army personnel in the Frimley area in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what has been the number of military personnel employed in the provision of medical services in the Aldershot area in each year since 1979;

(2) what has been the number of military personnel employed in the provision of medical services in the Camberley area in each year since 1979;

(3) what has been the number of military personnel employed in the provision of medical services in the Frimley area in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Six hundred and ninety seven military personnel are currently employed on medical duties in the Frimley, Aldershot and Camberley areas of the Army south-east district. Comparable figures for each year since 1979 are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what has been the number of civilians employed in the provision of medical services for military personnel in the Aldershot area in each year since 1979;

(2) what has been the number of civilians employed in the provision of medical services for military personnel in the Camberley area in each year since 1979;

(3) what has been the number of civilians employed in the provision of medical services for military personnel in the Frimley area in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Three hundred and six civilian personnel are currently employed on medical duties in the Frimley, Aldershot and Camberley areas of the Army's south-east district. Comparable figures of each year since 1979 are not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Widows (Pensions and Allowances)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much would be saved in a full year and how many people would be affected by (a) the abolition of the widowed mothers' allowance (personal) and (b) the raising from 40 to 45 years of the qualifying age for the lowest rate of widow's pension, as proposed in paragraph 5.52 and 5.53 of volume II of the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9518).

Mr. Newton: The financial effects and numbers affected would build up over time because entitlements at the time of change would not be affected. For widows concerned thereafter the effects would continue until they reached age 60, and beyond in a few cases. The following tables give broad estimates of the number of widows who would be affected during the first full year after abolition of widowed mothers' allowance (personal) (WMA(P)) and raising of the qualifying age for the lowest rate of widow's pension, as proposed in the Green Paper.

Implementation of all the Green Paper proposals for widows' benefits would cost the national insurance fund about £28 million during the first full year and be broadly cost-free in the second year. Savings would build up gradually after then with an approximate saving of £50 million by the fifth full year. These figures assume November 1984 benefit rates and that the new lump sum would be set at £1,000.

Numbers affected by the proposed abolition of widowed mothers' allowance (Personal) (WMA(P)) in the first full year of implementation

	Numbers entitled to WMA(P) under existing rules	Numbers of widows, presently entitled to WMA(P) with entitlements under Green Paper proposals
		£1,000 lump sum	Widow's pension (age related or full rate) immediately on bereavement for new awards	No entitlement to widow's pension
New awards	2,500	2,500	1,500	1,000
People transferring from widows mothers' allowance	10,500	*	9,000	1,500

Numbers affected by the proposed raising from 40-45 of qualifying age for lowest rate of widow's pension during the first full year

	Entitlement under current rules	Entitlements under the Green Paper proposals of widows who under existing rules would receive an age-related pension
	Numbers entitled to age-related widow's pension	£1,000 lump sum	Age-related widow's pension	No entitlement to widow's pension
New awards	5,000	5,000	†3,500	1,500
People transferring from WMA or WMA(P)	4,500	*	‡3,000	1,500

Notes to tables:

Numbers above are accurate only to the nearest 500. They are derived from 1983 estimate of the number of widow's receiving benefits.

* The majority of these widow's would have received widow's allowance when widowed, the others the lump sum payment.

† In addition some 11,000 new award widows who under existing rules would receive a full widow's pension would receive an age-related pension instead.

‡ In addition some 5,500 transferring widows who under existing rules would receive a full widow's pension would receive an age-related pension instead.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of teachers currently receiving family income supplement.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that this information is not available. Teachers are included for family income supplement statistical purposes in a general group which covers administrative, social, professional and technical workers and a breakdown by individual occupation is not possible.

Community Nurses

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many community nurses have been employed to cover the town of Marple in the Stockport health authority area in each year since May 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. My hon. Friend may care to contact the chairman of the Stockport Health Authority for the information he needs.

Convalescence

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what extent facilities for post-illness and post-operative convalescence are provided under the National Health Service.

Mr. John Patten: In recent years there has been a considerable reduction in the traditional form of convalescence. Within the National Health Service, post-illness and post-operative convalescence forms part of normal total medical care and patients are not now sent to special convalescence homes unless there are particular reasons for this. District health authorities are not required to notify the Department of any such arrangements they may make.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the staff levels for each year since 1979 in the ambulance service nationally.

Mr. John Patten: The figures requested are shown in the table:

NHS Directly Employed Ambulance Staff in England*
Whole Time Equivalent†

	Numbers
30 September:
1979	17,100
1980	17,800
1981	18,200
1982	18,300
1983	18,400
1984‡	18,100
31 March 1985‡	18,200

* Includes Ambulance Officers.
† All figures are rounded to nearest 100.
‡ Provisional.

Streptomycin

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many legal claims have been made against regional and district health authorities by patients suffering the side effects of treatment by streptomycin.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally.

Incapacity Benefits

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he proposes to introduce the payment of incapacity benefits fortnightly in arreas.

Mr. Newton: As is indicated in paragraph 6.19 of volume 2 of the Green Paper on the reform of social security, we are looking generally at the scope for greater simplicity and uniformity in social security procedures and operations. We have therefore decided not to implement this proposal for the time being, but to give it further consideration in this wider context.

Thames region (Expenditure)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has made any estimate of the percentage real increase in revenue expenditure of the individual Thames regional health authorities based on their present boundaries and responsibilities between 1978-79 to 1984-85.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The 1982 boundary changes and changes in management responsibility which I listed in my reply to my hon. Friend on 14 June at column 599 were substantial and complex. I am afraid that any estimate which attempted to project those changes back over previous years would be disproportionately costly and serve no practical purpose. The following table does, however, show the increases in expenditure in each of the Thames regions either side of the 1982 changes, and traces their distance from RAWP targets over the period. I hope that this goes some way towards meeting my hon. Friend's request.

Percentage real increase in revenue expenditure and distance from 'target' in the Thames regions

	Financial Year
	1978-79	1981-82	1982-83	1984-85	1985-86
North West Thames
Expenditure £ million	374·3	641·2	625·4	694·6	713·0
Percentage Increase	—	12·3	—	1·6	—
Distance from "target" per cent.	+13·29	+12·33	+9·62	+8·01	+7·10
North East Thames
Expenditure £ million	409·0	692·6	790·0	865·7	903·4
Percentage Increase	—	11·0	—	0·3	—
Distance from "target" per cent.	+12·52	+8·86	+11·32	+8·99	+9·71
South East Thames
Expenditure £ million	391·4	654·7	692·3	764·5	789·6
Percentage Increase	—	9·6	—	1·1	—
Distance from "target" per cent.	+10·70	+8·87	+8·48	+6·50	+5·59
South West Thames
Expenditure £ million	301·2	511·4	526·5	586·0	602·8
Percentage increase	—	11·3	—	1·8	—
Distance from "target" per cent.	+5·87	+5·67	+5·86	+7·31	+4·29

Notes:

1. Expenditure is the actual revenue expenditure from health authorities' summarised accounts for 1978-79, 1981-82 and 1982-83; provisional outturn for 1984-85; and initial cash limits for 1985-86.
2. Percentage increase represents the real increase in expenditure after taking account of general inflation as measured by the Gross Domestic Product deflator.
3. The distance from 'target' shows the Region's distance from its 'target' fair share of the available resources calculated according to the formula recommended by the Resource Allocation Working Party. Changes in distance from 'target' between 1981-82 and 1982-83 are affected by the 1982 boundary and management changes.

Perinatal Pathologists

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to refer to regional health authorities the recommendation contained in paragraph 66 of the third report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1983-84, HC 308, on perinatal and neonatal mortality, to the effect that those regional health authorities without a full-time consultant perinatal pathologist should make such an appointment.

Mr. John Patten: This recommendation reiterated one contained in the second report of the Social Services Committee which was published in 1980. This report and our response to it were distributed to all health authorities at that time.

Since then, the maternity services advisory committee has issued its reports on good practice in the maternity and neonatal services. It also recommended that each regional health authority should consider the appointment of at least one experienced pathologist with expertise and interest in perinatal pathology. We have commended these reports to all health authorities, and indicated that they should review their services, and take action if necessary.

Pensions (Costs)

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give an estimate of the costs of the basic retirement pension, supplementary pension, housing benefit, and state earnings-related pension scheme itemised separately (a) if the state earnings-related pension scheme is not phased out and (b) if the state earnings-related pension scheme is phased out according to the Green Paper proposals, for the following years: 1988-89, 1993-94, 2003-04, 2013-14, 2023-24 and 2033-34.

Mr. Newton: The estimated costs at 1984-85 prices, assuming prices upratings of the basic retirement pension and additional component, if the state earnings-related pension scheme (SERPS) were not to be phased out, are as follows:

	Basic Retirement Pension £ billion	Additional Component £ billion
1988-89	16·4	0·5
1993-94	16·6	1·3
2003-04	16·6	4·4
2013-14	18·1	9·6
2023-24	20·0	15·7
2033-34	21·9	23·1

The only available projections of supplementary pension and housing benefit costs are the illustrative estimates given in tables 2.18 to 2.20 and paragraph 2.35 in volume 3 of the Green Paper.

If SERPS is phased out in accordance with the Green Paper proposals, savings will not start to be made until after 2002. The cost of the scheme is expected to be reduced by about half by 2023-24, and by about three quarters by 2033-34. The estimated costs of basic retirement pension would be unaffected. More precise figures will not be available until the proposals in the Green Paper have been finalised in the light of consultations.

Tisdale Insurance Ltd. (Correspondence)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will reply to correspondence dated 3 April from the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth referring to a matter raised by Tisdale Insurance Ltd.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that we have no record of having received his letter, but if my hon. Friend would like to write again I will ensure he receives a prompt reply.

Funeral Expenses

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received on his proposal to change the system of assistance towards funeral expenses.

Mr. Whitney: By 4 July 1985, 13 representations had been received in response to the proposal in the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" for assistance with funeral expenses.

Cervical Cytology Recall Computer (Leicestershire)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the cervical cytology recall computer installed in April 1984 for use by the Leicestershire family practitioner committee will become fully operational.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Discussions are taking place between the Leicestershire health authority and the Leicestershire family practitioner committee with a view to implementing a computerised cervical cytology call and recall system during this financial year.

Benefit Changes

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list every change to social security benefits not announced in the benefit up-rating announcement in (a) 1980, (b) 1981, (c) 1982, (d) 1983 and (e) 1984 which came into operation under that year's changes;

(2) what changes to the non-dependent deductions were confirmed by his Department on or before 18 June; why these were not announced on 18 June; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will list every change to social security which was not mentioned in his 18 June statement to the House or the accompanying schedule of main benefit changes; and if he will give a full list of the gainers and losers in each case.

Mr. Newton: Around 300 individual benefit items will be increased in this year's uprating. As in previous years, the items covered, in addition to benefit rates, include not only the amounts of any additions or deductions to the rates, but also associated features such as earnings limits. Given the number of items to be uprated each year, it has always been the practice for the uprating statement to give details of the increases in the main weekly benefit rates plus any special changes to be made at the time of the uprating. The schedule which is placed before the House similarly covers the increases in the main rates.

The non-dependant deductions to supplementary benefit and housing benefit, which with the supplementary benefit non-householder housing addition will be increased in line with the housing element of the retail prices index this year in the usual way, have never been included in this schedule of main rates. Along with the other minor items, they are included in the various statutory instruments which will give effect to the uprating and which are being laid before the House currently. The vast majority of beneficiaries will gain from this year's uprating: the effects of increased deductions will be offset and usually outweighed by increases in benefit rates for those affected.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services at what income levels households will lose benefit as a result of the announcement of deductions for non-dependants to take effect from 25 November.

Mr. Newton: The amount of benefit a person receives depends on a number of factors including how much income he or she has and the actual amount of any housing costs paid. It is not possible therefore to give the information requested.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many households will receive reduced housing benefit as a result of the changes to take effect on 25 November if they have a (a) pensioner, (b) disabled person, (c) unemployed person or (d) young person up to 21 years, employed and unemployed, non-dependant, living with them; how much each one will lose; and how many households will lose benefit completely.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown: asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate how many persons will receive less in housing benefit, or have to pay more towards their rent and rates costs, as a result of the changes in non-dependent deductions to be implemented in November 1985; and how much money the changes involve;

(2) if he will show the weekly gross and net earnings levels at which eligibility for housing benefit will expire, assuming average amounts for rent and rates, following the proposals for the November 1985 uprating in respect of the following household types, assuming one wage-earner: (a) single person, (b) married couple, (c) married couple with one child, (d) married couple with two children, (e) married couple with three children and (f) married couple with an 18 year old in work or training, living at home; and if he will also provide information on the net income derived from these earnings levels taking account of income from child benefit and expenditure on housing costs, including water rates and average travel-to-work costs.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Volunteer Development Workers (Benefit)

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to improve the position of volunteer development workers who find that on return to the United Kingdom they are denied both unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit.

Mr. Newton: I am pleased to announce that with effect from 6 April 1986 a new special national insurance contribution will be introduced to enable volunteer development workers to earn entitlement to unemployment benefit. This will put right a long standing anomaly in the social security system, and will also enable us to comply with the European Community Council recommendation on social security for volunteer development workers which was adopted in June.

We also propose to make a change in the supplementary benefit scheme which will be of particular help to volunteer development workers returning to this country. We have today laid before Parliament the Supplementary Benefit (Resources) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1985 which, subject to the approval of Parliament, will come into effect in the late summer or early autumn so as to provide that earnings which have been received from full-time work overseas but which, for reasons outside the claimant's control, cannot be remitted to this country shall not be taken into account for supplementary benefit purposes. The effect will be to ensure that such persons will not be excluded from benefit on full-time work grounds by virtue of those earnings when they return to this country.

The regulations will also provide for two other beneficial but unrelated changes. Firstly, they will provide for a disregard of the capital value of a life interest or fixed term annuity and, secondly, they will correct an unintended affect of the current regulations concerning the treatment of final earnings received on termination of full-time employment so as to ensure that such earnings are not to be taken into account for any period beyond the period of full-time work exclusion. The Social Security Advisory Committee has agreed that these proposals should not be referred to it.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Unemployment Benefit

79. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will introduce legislation to limit the payment of unemployment benefit outside the assisted areas to those genuinely seeking work.

Mr. Newton: An essential element of the social security scheme is that the qualifying conditions for benefit are the same for everyone and it would be wrong to have different rules for people in different parts of the country. Unemployment benefit is payable to people who are unemployed and who, in addition to satisfying the contribution conditions, are capable of and available for work. Those drawing benefit sign a declaration regularly that they have been unable to obtain any work and benefit is paid only on the basis that claimants, no matter where they may live, are seeking employment.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from representatives of local government in London concerning the operation of the new supplementary benefit regulations in respect of board and lodging charges for those under 25 years of age; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. Whitney: We have received a number of representations of a general nature from local government representatives and bodies in London. We have also received two letters from the housing department in the London borough of Newham. Both letters concern an individual affected by the restrictions on payment as a boarder. The local office has been asked for a full report on these cases and a reply will be sent shortly.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations and whose accommodation charge is (a) up to £5 above the upper limit, (b) between £6 and £10 above the upper limit, (c) between £11 and £20 above the upper limit, (d) between £21 and £30 above the upper limit, (e) between £31 and £40 above the upper limit, (f) between £41 and £50 above the upper limit and (g) £51 or more above the upper limit; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, for England, Wales and Scotland;

(2) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who are 25 years old or under and who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations as a result of which their benefit (a) has been restricted at the outset and (b) has not been restricted at the outset; and if he will give this information for Great Britain, for England, Wales and Scotland;

(3) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in hostels, residential care homes and nursing homes, who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations and whose accommodation charge is (a) above and (b) within the new upper limits; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, for England, Wales and Scotland;

(4) what are the latest available figures since 29 April for the number of existing claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations and who are (a) aged between 16 and 17 years, (b) aged between 18 and 20 years, (c) aged between 21 and 25 years, (d) aged between 26 years and pension age and (e) pensioners; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, for England, Wales and Scotland;

(5) what are the latest available figures since 29 April for the number of claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations and who are (a) aged between 16 and 17 years, (b) aged between 18 and 20 years, (c) aged between 21 and 25 years, (d) aged between 26 years and pension age and (e) pensioners; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, for England, Wales and Scotland;

(6) what information was used to determine the weekly upper limits for ordinary board and lodging claims by couples without dependent children under the age of 11 years provided under the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985;

(7) what are the latest available figures since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, who are 25 years old or under and who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations as a result of which their benefit has been restricted from the outset where (i) this restriction has been lifted subsequently and (ii) this restriction has not been lifted subsequently; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, for England, Wales and Scotland;

(8) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (i) existing claimants and (ii) claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit, ordinary board and lodging allowance in the Aberystwyth local Department of Health and Social Security office area who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations and whose accommodation charge is (a) up to £5, (b) between

£6 and £10, (c) between £11 and £20, (d) between £21 and £30, (e) between £31 and £40 and (f) more than £41 above the new upper limit;

(9) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in hostels, residential care homes and nursing homes, in the Brighton local Department of Health and Social Security office area who have been assessed under the new benefit regulations and whose accommodation charge is (i) above and (ii) within the new upper limits;

(10) what are the latest available figures for the period since 29 April for the number of (a) existing claimants and (b) claimants whose address has changed and new and repeat claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in hostel, residential care home or nursing home accommodation, in the Taunton local Department of Health and Social Security office area who are 25 years old or under and have been assessed under the new benefit regulations as a result of which their benefit (i) has been restricted at the outset and (ii) has not been restricted at the outset.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the analyses of ordinary board and lodging in all local offices including Aberystwyth, Brighton and Taunton, following the 29 April changes have not yet been completed.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he has made to monitor the effects of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 in relation to people claiming supplementary benefit, ordinary board and lodging allowance (a) by sex and (b) by ethnic group of claimant.

Mr. Newton: There are no specific plans to monitor separately the sex or ethnic group of people claiming supplementary benefit for ordinary board and lodging following the 29 April 1985 changes.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest available figures since 29 April for the number of claimants of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowance, excluding those living in hostels, residential care homes and nursing homes, who have been assessed under the new benefit rules and who are (a) aged 26 years or over and (b) aged 25 years or under whose accommodation charge is within the new upper limit and who are receiving a special addition to their benefit; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, for England, Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Newton: This information is not being collected as part of the initial statistical monitoring of claims assessed under the new rules introduced from 29 April 1985.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to use his power to create exemption categories from the restrictions on young people for supplementary benefit in board and lodging to exempt (a) young people aged over 18 years who have no parents, (b) young people who have no parents in the United Kingdom because their parents have returned to their country of origin or are service people abroad, (c) young people who have been in care but not in the past year and (d) young people who need to remain in the area where they are now staying in order to have access to a child living with a separated partner.

Mr. Newton: We are considering if there is a need for the extensive list of exemptions to be increased further, in the light of representations and information from local offices.

Whipps Cross Hospital

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the time scale for the plans for rebuilding work at Whipps Cross hospital; and who was consulted in their preparation.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to approach the chairman of North-East Thames regional health authority for it.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Whitney: The number of staff working in the Department during 1984-85 actually increased from 90,474 at 1 April 1984 to 92,788 at 1 April 1985. This increase was due to the need to recruit additional staff during the year to handle extra work generated by the industrial dispute at the Newcastle central office. Without this dispute the Department would have achieved a modest reduction in staff numbers.

Post Neonatal Mortality

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he has issued any guidelines to health authorities regarding the monitoring of sudden infant death syndrome; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has issued any guidelines to health authorities regarding the implementation of special health care measures for babies at high risk from sudden infant death syndrome; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what steps he is taking to implement the recommendations of the Knowelden report on sudden infant death syndrome.

Mr. John Patten: Copies of the report by Professor Knowelden were sent to each regional general manager, regional medical officer and regional nursing officer on 5 February 1985. We expect each health authority to consider, and to keep under review, whether the incidence of sudden infant deaths indicates a need for and special action with regard to babies they feel are at risk.

Following the publication of the report the Department arranged a conference to bring together health professionals, professional bodies and others to discuss the conclusions and the wide range of recommendations in the report. Officials are now considering the main areas of concern arising from those discussions in order to identify what positive steps can be taken to reduce postneonatal mortality rates and where necessary to improve the quality of infant care.

School Leavers (Supplementary Benefit)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will reintroduce the full entitlement to supplementary benefit to the current summer's school leavers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Supplementary benefit entitlement for a school leaver commences from a set "terminal date" at the end of the holiday following the child's final term at school. This sytem was introduced to avoid the previous complicated and administratively costly situation where a large number of short-term claims to benefit were received from children who subsequently decided to return to school. Child benefit and any appropriate dependency additions remain payable to the parents in the interim. The system works well and we have no plans to change it.

Social Security Review

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether in the "Reform of Social Security" it is proposed that an unemployed person who is aged less than 25 years with a partner and a dependem child should receive a lower rate of income support than a similar person aged over 25 years.

Mr. Newton: The rate of personal allowance for a couple aged under 25 would be lower than for a couple aged 25 and above. However, the amount paid for each dependent child would be the same for each couple and, in addition, the same family premium would be payable.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the proportion of supplementary benefit single payments to unemployed claimants which are made to claimants who are under 25 years old; and what proportion is made for furniture or other household goods.

Mr. Whitney: Information on which to base a reliable estimate is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of those currently on supplementary benefit are entitled to more than £63 per week.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the exact information requested is not available. At December 1983, the latest date for which information is available, 4 per cent. of supplementary benefit claimants received benefit of more than £60 a week.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of (a) men and (b) women who do not receive supplementary benefit because their spouse is earning.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that no information is kept of the number of unsuccessful claims caused by earnings of a spouse.

Tinnitus Clinic (University College Hospital)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet reached conclusions on the research report on the tinnitus clinic at University College hospital; if he will make funds available for the maintenance of the clinic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The results of the multi-centre field trial of tinnitus maskers, in which the tinnitus clinic at University College hospital took part, are now being evaluated. The question of funding for the clinic is a matter for Bloomsbury health authority.

NHS (Hearing Aids)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the longest and shortest average period for which deaf people have to wait for the provision of National Health Service hearing aids; if he will provide a tabular breakdown of these figures according to each health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) on 24 May at column 587.

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the total expenditure on National Health Service ancillary services for the latest available year including practitioner service staff;

(2) what was the total expenditure on National Health Service professional and technical services for the latest available year;

(3) what was the total expenditure on National Health Service administrative and clerical services for the latest available year;

(4) what was the total expenditure on National Health Service works and maintenance services for the latest available year.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have replies as soon as possible.

Royal Victoria Infirmary, Newcastle

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will examine whether the decision concerning tenders for domestic services at the Royal Victoria infirmary in Newcastle conforms with health circular HC(83)18.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are looking into Newcastle health authority's decision and I will write to my hon. Friend in due course.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for each district health authority and for each regional health authority, what is the number of young people between the ages of 16 and 19 years living in long-stay mental handicap hospitals; and for each authority what is the number living in units of (a) 25 or more beds and (b) under 25 beds;

(2) for each district health authority and for each regional health authority, what is the number of children in long-stay mental handicap hospitals; and for each authority what is the number living in units of (a) 25 or more beds, (b) under 25 beds.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not collected centrally in precisely the form requested. I shall let my hon. Friend have the available information as soon as possible.

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many households on supplementary benefit are subject to non-dependant deductions from housing benefit.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Children (Long-Stay Hospitals)

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue guidelines to local authority social services departments regarding the regularity with which they review the numbers of children for whom they have responsibility in long-stay hospitals, and regarding the time scale for moving children out of such hospitals.

Mr. John Patten: Guidance on this subject was issued by the Department to both local and health authorities in 1978, and has been repeated, in connection with mentally handicapped children, in 1981 and 1983.

PRIME MINISTER

Cairo and Amman

Q19. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she is now in a position to announce details of her visit to Cairo and Amman.

The Prime Minister: I have accepted invitations to visit Egypt and Jordan later this year, but I am not yet in a position to announce further details.

Falkland Islands (Fishing)

Q105. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will have discussions with the Governments of Poland, Spain, Japan, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, East Germany, West Germany, Italy, Bulgaria, Denmark, Sweden, Liberia, Norway, the Philippines, Panama, Brazil and Uruguay about the number of vessels engaged in fishing operations within 150 miles of the Falklands.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 4 July, at column 197.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 9 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

TRANSPORT

M25

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he still expects at least two motorway service areas to be fully operational on the M25 by the time it is completed.

Mrs. Chalker: I hope that the service area planned for South Mimms will be open by the time the M25 is completed. The other three service areas planned for the M25 will follow as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he can give the new expected dates for the opening of the remaining stages of the M25.

Mrs. Chalker: We expect to have the whole of the M25 open to traffic by the end of 1986. The actual opening dates of the remaining sections depend on the progress made by individual contractors, which in turn is influenced by weather and ground conditions, and by the requirements of sound traffic management.

The current contract completion dates for the unfinished sections are as follows:

Section	Date
M4-M40	28 July 1985
Wisley-Leatherhead	5 August 1985
Leatherhead-Reigate	26 August 1985
Leatherhead Interchange	Complete but opening depends on contracts either side.
Poyle-M4	15 September 1985
M4 Interchange	15 June 1986
Swanley-Sevenoaks	8 July 1986
Bedmond Road-A405	21 September 1986
Micklefield Green-Bedmond Road	6 October 1986
The Bell-South Mimms	26 October 1986
A405-The Bell (A6)	2 November 1986

Motor Agents Association

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what requests he has received from the Motor Agents Association to have a meeting with Ministers; and what replies have been sent.

Mrs. Chalker: The association has made several requests for a further meeting to discuss the new conditions of appointment to the MOT testing scheme. Before deciding when I can meet the association, I should like to study the new proposals it says it has for improving enforcement of the scheme. I have suggested that these are tabled at a forthcoming meeting the association is holding with my officials.

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport when was the last time he had discussions with representatives of the Motor Agents Association about problems of vehicle testing.

Mrs. Chalker: I met representatives of the association on 18 December last to discuss the introduction of new conditions of appointment to the MOT testing scheme.

London Area Assessment Studies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the consultants carrying out the London area assessment studies have obtained current data on traffic and travel patterns in the areas concerned.

Mrs. Chalker: A considerable amount of information has been assembled for these important studies of London's problems. Regrettably the GLC and certain boroughs have so far failed to make available the relevant material they hold. However, I hope the consultants will shortly obtain the remaining data they need.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total cost of the four London area assessment studies.

Mrs. Chalker: That will depend on how much work the successive stages of the studies require and the extent to which the GLC and the boroughs make relevant data available to the Department of Transport.

MV Bridgeness

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport what advice the National Conservancy Council, Great Britain headquarters, gave concerning risks to wildlife connected with the salvage operations of MV Bridgeness.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Nature Conservancy Council advised that the position of the oil spill and its likely movement would put breeding birds at risk. It was aware that the Marine Pollution Control Unit already held information of breeding colonies of sea birds around our coast. It recognised that the oil was of a type which could not be chemically dispersed and was likely to be of a persistent nature and it asked to be kept informed of future movement and distribution of the oil.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport on what date and at what time did MV Bridgeness run aground on the Hats and Barrels reef; and what were the weather conditions.

Mr. David Mitchell: MV Bridgeness reported her grounding at 7.59 pm (local time) on Sunday 16 June 1985. The weather conditions were light airs, calm sea and good visibility.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the MV Bridgeness was proceeding under its own power when it ran aground recently on the Hats and Barrels reef.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department is holding a preliminary investigation into the circumstances of this grounding; but there is no present evidence that the ship was not proceeding under her own power.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport when notice of the grounding of MV Bridgeness was given to the Nature Conservancy Council, Great Britain headquarters.

Mr. David Mitchell: At 10.10 am (approximately) on Monday 17 June, after which contact was maintained.

WALES

New-born Children

Mr. Hubbard-Miles asked the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made since the announcement in May 1983 of his initiative to improve the quality of care for newly born children and their mothers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The perinatal mortality initiative survey group has published a newsletter reporting the progress that it and the catalyst team have made in their first year and setting out their plans for the remainder of the initiative. A copy of the newsletter has been placed in he Library and it is being given a very wide distribution among those concerned with providing maternity and neo-natal care. Copies have been sent to hon. Members representing Welsh constituencies.

I am grateful for the survey group's agreement to issue this newsletter. I hope it will be widely read and provide all those professionally concerned with the care of mothers and the new born with a useful summary of the survey group and catalyst team's activities during their first year. I applaud their efforts and look forward to seeing their final report next year.

I was pleased to see that figures which have just become available show a reduction in the perinatal mortality rate in Wales from 11·3 to 10·5 deaths per thousand births, between 1983 and 1984. This is welcome news and I hope this reduction will continue.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Equipment Expenditure

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the local education authority expenditure on equipment, in each of the last five years, in terms of (a) cost, (b) real terms according to 1982-83 prices and (c) the percentage of the local education authority budget as a whole for each local education authority and for all local education authorities in total.

Mr. Dunn: The information for the last five years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. It is, however, possible to provide it for three of them but it is not possible to give the information for some authorities: expenditure on equipment is one of the items covered by the school capitation allowances and an analysis of the components of these allowances is not always available.

N/A=not available.

Notes:

1. The expenditure covers educational tools, equipment and materials including supplies for cookery courses and repairs and maintenance to equipment. It does not include premises, cleaning, domestic or administrative equipment.
2. Real terms are the cash terms adjusted by the Gross Domestic Product (Market Prices) Deflator (1982-83—100).
3. The expenditure on equipment has been expressed as a percentage of each authority's grand total net expenditure on education.

Teacher Training

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the numbers of university and polytechnic graduates who have started teachers' training courses in each academic year since 1978-79.

Mr. Dunn: On the basis of the available information, the number of students entering postgraduate courses of initial teacher training in each academic year since 1978-79 is estimated as follows:

	Number
1978-79	9,337
1979-80	9,441
1980-81	11,278
1981-82	11,333
1982-83	8,887
1983-84	8,414
1984-85	8,572

Information is not available for each of these years on the number of such students who completed their first degrees in universities and in public sector institutions respectively.

Secondary Schools (Articles of Government)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which local education authorities since November 1982 have sought his permission to change their articles of government for secondary schools; which of these authorities were given permission; which were denied permission; and, in each case, what were the reasons for the refusal.

Mr. Dunn: I shall reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Investment

Mr. Best asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will give, for each of the years for which figures are available since 1979, the amount of inward investment into the United Kingdom from abroad, expressed as a percentage of the national investment portfolio;

(2) if he has any evidence of a correlation between the absence of exchange controls and the level and trend of investment in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what information he has as to the percentage of the national investment portfolio which has been invested abroad for each of the years for which figures are available since 1979.

Mr. Peter Rees: It is difficult to quantify the effect of the abolition of exchange controls in 1979 on domestic investment, since that depends on an assessment of what might have happened had the controls remained in force. There is no reason to believe that abolition was harmful to domestic investment and it could well have been beneficial, exerting downward pressure on the exchange rate and upward pressure on profitability in the traded goods sector, possibly thereby contributing to the record level of fixed investment in 1984.

The main effect, however, is likely to have been on the form of overseas investment. The increase in the net overseas assets of the non-bank private sector, up £81 billion between 1979 and 1984, owes much to investors' ability to choose to invest in appreciating assets.

There is no one definition of the "national investment portfolio". The following table expresses the stock of overseas financial assets and liabilities held by the non-bank private sector in each year since 1979 as a percentage of the total financial assets and liabilities of the United Kingdom non-bank private sector.

Non-bank private sector

	Overseas financial assets as percentage of total financial assets	Overseas financial liabilities as percentage of total financial liabilities
1979	24·9	28·9
1980	25·1	28·6
1981	27·8	27·3
1982	30·3	25·6
1983	32·2	24·3
1984	35·2	22·6

Exchange Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the figures given in the answer of 19 December 1984, Official Report, columns 187-89, to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on the rate of exchange between the pound sterling and the central reference point of the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The figures requested are in the table.

Sterling-European currency unit exchange rate (end-month rates): percentage change from notional central rate

Drugs

Mr. Arnold asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the quantity of drugs seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers at the static controls of travellers at United Kingdom points of entry, as compared with the total quantity seized in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Travellers' Allowances

Mr. Arnold asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the current arrangements made by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to publicise increases in travellers' allowances, including their notification to travel operators and other interested parties.

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise issues an immediate detailed press release whenever legislative effect is given to such increases. As soon as practicable thereafter, revised public notices are printed and made available to all interested parties.

Excise Duty

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue which would be raised by raising the duty on spirits by 25p in 1985-86.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is estimated that the full-year net revenue yield from raising the duty on spirits by 25p per bottle in 1985-86 would be about £30 million (including consequential VAT).

Lloyd's Syndicates (Tax Inspectors)

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax inspectors are employed in the special team responsible for aspects of Lloyd's syndicates; how many of them are concerned with investigating reinsurance arrangements; when they expect to complete this investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985]: Nine tax inspectors are currently employed; and it is not possible to say when their work will be completed.

European Community Budget

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many member states of the European Economic Community have taken the necessary legislative or other steps to permit their respective treasuries to make payments to the European Economic Community in terms of the undertaking of the Council on 23 April designed to enable the United Kingdom's 1985 rebate to be paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985]: In a footnote to the 1985 intergovernmental agreement six member states, including the United Kingdom, made it clear that payments under the IGA required the completion of national procedures. We do not have complete information on the present position. However our understanding is that only the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, the Netherlands and the Republic of Ireland are yet in a position to pay.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Independent Radio (Derby, Nottingham and Leicester)

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he now contemplates a regional role for independent radio in Derby, Nottingham and Leicester; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government remain committed to the principle of independent local radio. When Centre Radio in Leicester ceased broadcasting in October 1983, the successful applicant for the re-advertised contract was Leicester Sound, in which Radio Trent in Nottingham has a majority shareholding. The two stations share some programming, but Leicester Sound broadcasts its own local programmes for nine and a half hours each weekday.

As far as Derby is concerned, the reasons for approving in principle the extension of the Nottingham franchise area were set out in the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) on 28 March, at columns 284-85. My right hon. and learned Friend emphasised, however, that progress would depend on the outcome of local consultation, and that the proposed arrangements would not preclude the setting up of a separate ILR station for Derby in future if circumstances permit.

Metropolitan Police (Expenditure)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was, for each year since 1979, the amount spent by the Metropolitan police on (a) police control and command suites, (b) the fittings of senior officers' accommodation and (c) chauffer-driven cars.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what microfiche or other similar facility exists to record information entered on the police national computer but subsequently removed; and if he will make a statement as to the extent of this record.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The national identification bureau retains a microfiche record of every record which has been deleted from the criminal names file of the police national computer. The purpose of the microfiche, which contains only the original reference number of the deleted record, is to prove that a record has been deliberately destroyed and not lost or corrupted by the computer.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have served prison sentences of less than one week at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, in the past three months.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, about 20 persons were initially received into Birmingham prison in the period 1 March to 31 May 1985 to serve sentences of less than one week.

Sentenced Persons (Transfers)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which countries have ratified the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons; from how many of these countries British prisoners will become eligible for transfer to the United Kingdom on 1 August; and when prisoners in the other signatory countries will become eligible for such a transfer.

Mr. Mellor: The convention has been ratified by Sweden, France, Spain, the USA, the United Kingdom and Canada. The transfer of British prisoners under the convention will become possible from Sweden, France, Spain and the USA on 1 August and from Canada on 1 September. The transfer of British prisoners under the convention from other signatory countries will be possible when the convention is in force for those countries, that is from the first day of the month following the expiry of a period of three months after the date of their ratification.

Voluntary After-care Hostels

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average cost to public funds of a place in a voluntary after-care hostel.

Mr. Mellor: The information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. In addition to grant from the Home Office towards the revenue costs of places in the voluntary after-care scheme, which averages about £1,000 a year per place, some projects receive capital and revenue funding from other Government Departments. Also, many residents receive social security benefits to meet the cost of hostel charges; the probation service makes an unquantifiable contribution to the management of these places; and projects run by voluntary organisations with charitable status may receive some tax benefit.

Dogs

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used in confirming byelaws to ban dogs from enclosed recreation grounds and children's play areas.

Mr. Mellor: The criteria applied are whether the grounds and areas require special protection from dogs and whether adequate alternative areas exist locally for the exercise of dogs. We normally accept the need for a ban in respect of enclosed children's play areas. Careful consideration is given to all representations received from members of the public.

Roberto Fiore (Extradition)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received a request from the Italian Government for the extradition of Roberto Fiore from the United Kingdom to Italy.

Mr. Mellor: In 1981 the Government of Italy requested the extradition of Mr. Fiore, together with six others, as a person accused of murder, attempted murder, robbery and arson. The case was referred to Bow Street magistrates' court, but in February 1982 the chief magistrate discharged Mr. Fiore because a prima facie case had not been established against him. No further request for his extradition has been received.

Reubens Hotel Bomb

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he knows from which country the explosives and detonators in the bomb found at the Reubens hotel, London, originated.

Mr. Brittan: Criminal charges have now been brought in connection with the device found at the Ruebens hotel and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on its origin.

Prisoners

Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 5 June, Official Report, column 158, if he will publish the cost of each of the 16 new prisons within the prison building programme.

Mr. Mellor: The estimates are as follows:

	£000
Wayland, Norfolk	16,500
Stocken, Leicestershire	12,500
Thorn Cross, Cheshire	8,500
Full Sutton, Humberside	19,700
Mount, Hertfordshire	16,730
Littlehey, Cambridgeshire	17,900
Swaleside, Kent	21,932
Garth, Lancashire	24,313
Woolwich, Greater London	50,975
Brinsford, Staffordshire	18,460
March, Cambridgeshire	23,700
Bicester, Oxfordshire	27,600
Lancaster Farms, Lancashire	13,000
Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire	28,600
Ashford, Middlesex	30,000
Site in North Region	30,000

The total estimated cost is now just over £360 million. The figure of approximately £340 million given in my reply to a question from the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 5 June, at columns 157-58, was based on estimates made in January 1985, the latest then available.

Soho (Bomb)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the origin of the TNT in the bomb at Great Windmill street, Soho, on Saturday 15 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I understand that the TNT was of a Soviet type and originated within the Soviet bloc, but it is not known exactly where it was manufactured.

Fires

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will give the figures for fatal and non-fatal casualties from accidental fires in dwellings by source of ignition in 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984;

(2) if he will give the latest available figures of fires in dwellings and other occupied buildings by source of ignition.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information for the years 1978 to 1983 on casualties in accidental fires in dwellings in the United Kingdom, analysed by source of ignition, is published in table 11 of the issue of "Fire Statistics United Kingdom" for 1983. A more detailed analysis by source of ignition of the numbers of all fires in both dwellings and other occupied buildings and of the resulting casualties, is given for 1983 in table 32 of this publication. Corresponding analyses for earlier years are published in the issues for those years, except that for years before 1981, this more detailed analysis was on a slightly different basis. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Police (Discipline)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each year since 1979 the number of appeals from police disciplinary hearings he received, the number of such appeals he referred to an appeal tribunal under the 1975 criteria, the number he referred to an appeal tribunal other than under the 1975 criteria, the number dealt with other than by reference to an appeal tribunal, the total and percentage where the original finding was upheld, where the original finding was reversed, where the original punishment was upheld and where the original punishment was reversed, respectively.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985, c. 241]: The information requested is as follows:

1979

	Total		Dismissed		Punishment Varied		Allowed

* Includes appeals withdrawn before determination which have not been shown elsewhere.

Notes:

The figures in the second, third and fourth columns, giving the results of appeals, reflect the outcome of the appeals received in the year in question, although not necessarily determined in that year. An appeal may be in respect of more than one charge: the outcome shown is in respect of the most serious punishment appealed in each case.

Fifteen appeals lodged in 1983 and 51 in 1984 remain to be determined.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Tourism (Hill Farmers)

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his plans to introduce new measures to encourage hill farmers to branch out into tourism and craft industries as well as for assistance for young farmers; and whether such tourist measures will also apply to the Isles of Scilly.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the statutory instruments which I laid before Parliament yesterday and to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne). If Parliament approves these instruments, young farmers will be eligible for capital grants at a quarter above the basic rates and tourism and craft grants wil be available in LFAs at 25 per cent. Both of these measures will apply to the Isles of Scilly.

Young Farmers (Grants)

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, following the agreement reached at the meeting of the EC Council (Agriculture) on 11 and 12 March, he will now announce a scheme of grants to young farmers who take over the management of their farms from their parents.

Mr. Jopling: I intend to assist young farmers by paying them a supplement of 25 per cent. on aid given under improvement plans. The statutory instruments which will give effect to this measure, and introduce the other new capital grants arrangements as from 1 October, was laid before the House in draft yesterday.

Land Drainage and Flood Prevention

Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will publish the aggregate results of cost-benefit appraisals of land drainage and flood protection schemes.

Mr. Jopling: I have today placed in the Library of the House a paper summarising the revised cost/benefit procedures for land drainage and flood protection schemes. This is for the use of all drainage authorities seeking grant aid in England and Wales from my Department or from the Secretary of State for Wales. The paper sets out the form in which we intend to issue the aggregate results of cost benefit appraisals for individual land drainage and flood protection schemes to interested parties, and fulfils the undertaking given in paragraph 2.11 of the consultation paper on the financing and administration of land drainage, flood protection and coast protection issued earlier this year.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Management Buy-outs

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish tables showing the information he currently has as to the development of companies established following management buy-outs with particular reference to capital employed, margins of profit earned and numbers of employees.

Mr. Fletcher: No. The Department does not collect statistics on management buy-outs and therefore has no systematic information available on the subsequent development of such companies.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy in regard to the disposal of shares in management buy-outs at the time of retirement or the decease of an employee shareholder; and if he will take steps to facilitate the purchase by the company or by a trust established by the company of the shares owned by employee shareholders.

Mr. Fletcher: The disposal of shares in management buy-outs on the death or retirement of an employee shareholder is a matter for those concerned.

The Companies Act 1985 already provides for qualifying companies to purchase their own shares and if applicable this arrangement may constitute a possible route for disposal. Companies however may not retain their own shares, an important safeguard for the legitimate interests of shareholders and creditors. This principle would circumscribe further steps to facilitate arrangements of the sort suggested by my hon. Friend.

Fancy Pens (Paint Content)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to prevent the sale of pens which look like vegetables and have a high level of lead and chromium in their paint.

Mr. Fletcher: The level of lead and chromium in the paint on pens is already restricted by The Pencils and Graphic Instruments (Safety) Regulations 1974 SI No. 226. At least two suppliers have already been prosecuted for selling vegetable-shaped pens with high levels of lead in the paint, and all local trading standards officers have been notified about them.

Oil Exports

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his reply on 3 July to the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox), what was the value for oil exports to other member countries of the European Community for the year to May 1985 and for 1978.

Mr. Fletcher: The figures, at current prices, are in the table.

United Kingdom exports of oil to European Community (OTS basis)*

	£ billion

Year ending May 1985	11·2

Vauxhall Cars

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress made by General Motors towards manufacture in the United Kingdom of more cars that are sold in the United Kingdom under the Vauxhall name.

Mr. Butcher: In 1984 General Motors stated to Government its intention to work for a better balance between what it sold in the United Kingdom and what it manufactures and purchases here. Within this broad objective, Vauxhall aimed to source in the United Kingdom 65 per cent. of the cars sold here by the end of 1984. In fact Vauxhall only sourced 42 per cent. of its cars here in 1984, 45 per cent. in the current year to date, and now says it is unlikely to achieve a 65 per cent. local build over at least the next three years. The United Kingdom content even of those cars that are made here was less than 50 per cent. in 1984. The Government look to Vauxhall to provide a substantial and convincing demonstration of its willingness to move in the right direction and are continuing discussions aimed at achieving that objective.

Foam-filled Furniture

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what Government-funded research is being carried out into the flammability of foam-filled furniture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The Government have contributed to the funding of research at Queen Mary college, University of London, into flexible polyurethane foam which when burnt has a reduced propensity for emitting smoke and toxic gas. Some results of this research are promising. Applications for patents have been made. A final report is expected in the autumn.

The Government have also contributed to work undertaken at the Rubber and Plastics Research Associaion into standardising ignition sources for testing furniture, with a view to obtaining international agreement on appropriate standards.

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to research other than Government-funded research being carried out into the flammability of foam-filled furniture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: We are advised from time to time of allegedly new discoveries for reducing the flammability of foam-filled furniture. None has yet fulfilled the ultimate requirement of enabling manufacturers to make their full variety of furniture resistant to match ignition (or otherwise of significantly reduced flammability) without imposing some burdens of increased cost and reduced comfort. Some of these advances have found application in the manufacture of contract furniture for a variety of purposes. Development of such techniques, so that they may be applied in the domestic market, is clearly very desirable.

Cigarettes

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what information he has as to research other than Government-funded research being carried out into the self-extinguishing cigarette; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what Government-funded research is being carried out into the self-extinguishing cigarette; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what information he has as to research being carried out in Australia and the United States into the self-extinguishing cigarette; and what assessment has been made of the implications for British research in this area.

Mr. Fletcher: No Government funded research is being carried out in the United Kingdom into the self-extinguishing cigarette. We are not aware of research other than Government-funded work either. The independent scientific committee on smoking and health has not been approached with any request for a review of any additive intended to make cigarettes self-extinguishing. The committee will no doubt have its own view of the priority to be attached to saving life by reducing the inhalation hazard of cigarette smoking versus that which might be achieved by reducing the smouldering capacity of cigarettes.

Some years ago the National Bureau of Standards in the United States conducted a survey on the ability of cigarettes to continue smouldering when placed in a situation comparable to that under which upholstery ignitability is tested. Considerable variation was shown in this property, which appeared to be related to the dimensions of cigarettes and the presence or absence of filter tips. I am not aware of any follow-up work having been undertaken in the United States. Nor do I have any information on Australian research in this area.

A straightforward survey of this kind would update the information now available and serve as a useful basis for further consideration of this topic. The Government are therefore arranging for this to begin shortly.

Chrysoidine Dye

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has now perused the specialist research paper produced in the Lancet of 29 June on "Coarse Fishing and Risk of Urethelial Cancer", a copy of which is in his possession; if he will now issue further guidance to all bodies concerned in producing, handling and using chrysoidine dye of the dangers of bladder cancer associated with its use; if he will not consider banning this product; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: I am awaiting the advice of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health who is giving the paper urgent attention. It is of course a long term rather than a short term problem.

Recycling

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what have been the results to date of the contact between the Minister responsible for recycling and the United Kingdom Reclamation Council;

(2) if he will make a statement about current Government policy on waste recycling; and whether he intends to make any changes.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Air Pollution

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if work at the National Physical Laboratory on the corrosion of metals by air pollutants has been started.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985]: NPL is carrying out a survey on the effects of atmospheric pollution on the corrosion of metals, in order to quantify changes in rates of corrosion consequent on changes in levels of pollution over the years, and to make recommendations on further work required to facilitate cost-benefit calculations. NPL has put proposals to the Department of the Environment for research on atmospheric corrosion and these have now been agreed. The NPL expects to commence work shortly.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Court of Human Rights

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times the United Kingdom has found itself involved in actions before the European Court of Human Rights; and what informatiion he has for the comparable figues for member states of the Council of Europe.

Mr. Renton: For the period since 1966, when the United Kingdom recognised the competence of the Commission to receive individual petition and the compulsory jurisdiction of the court, up to the end of June 1985 there have been 20 cases referred to the European Court of Human Rights against the United Kingdom. There were 12 findings of violation, two findings of non-violation and six cases are pending. The figures for other member states of the Council of Europe are as follows:

	Accepted right of individual petition since:	Accepted compulsory jurisdiction of Court since	No of cases Referred:	Violations	Non-Violations	Pending	Terminated in some other way

ENVIRONMENT

Environment Ministers Council

Mrs McCurley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the outcome of the Council of Environment Ministers meeting on 27 June.

Mr. Waldegrave: I was accompanied at this meeting by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West, (Mr. Butcher), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

In the context of a proposed directive on standards for car exhaust emissions the council reached an agreement, ad referendum in the case of the United Kingdom and subject to a general reserve by Denmark. The United Kingdom hopes to confirm its agreement at an early meeting of the Council; meanwhile, a number of outstanding technical points remain to be satisfactorily clarified.

The standards in the agreement are as follows:

*Category of vehicle	†Implementation dates	Grammes per ECE test: Carbon Monoxide	Hydrocarbons and nitrogen oxides	Nitrogen oxides more than ‡2 litres	1988-89	25	6·5	3·5
1·4-2 litres	1991-93	30	8·0	No separate limit
Less than 1·4 litres
Stage 1	1990-91	45	15·0	6·0
Stage 2	1992-93	Limits to be decided before the end of 1987

* The table sets out the type approval limits for passenger cars. Diesel engined cars of more than 2 litres are treated as if their cubic capacity lies between 1·4 and 2 litres.

† The date in each year is 1 October. The first date is the earliest that member states may require new type approvals to meet the standard. The second date is the earliest that member states may require all newly registered cars to meet the standard.

‡ Cars in this category which satisfy US 1983 test criteria will also qualify for Community type approval. The duration of the availability of this alternative will be settled in the light of decisions, to be taken by the end of 1987, on the new European test cycle.

Subject to a parliamentary reserve by the United Kingdom the Council discussed a proposed directive to provide limit values and quality objectives for discharges of certain dangerous substances to the aquatic environment. Progress was made in examining the text aand towards the inclusion of DDT and pentachlorophenol, but no decisions were reached on the proposal to include chloroform and carbon tetrachloride. A brief discussion on the proposed directive on the disposal of waste from the titanium dioxide industry indicated that all member states wished to see the reduction or elimination of pollution from this source, but there was no agreement on how this should be achieved. The proposal was remitted for further consideration at the next Environment Council.

All member states welcomed a new proposal for a directive to continue indefinitely as from 1 October the present ban on the importation into the Community of skins of harp and hooded seal pups and products derived therefrom. This was remitted for urgent examination with a view to early agreement.

Substantial agreement was reached on a proposed directive to restrict further the marketing and use of polychorinated byphenyls (PCBs) and polychlorinated terphenyls (PCTs). Member states will be obliged to prohibit the new use of these substances in existing applications by July 1986. The new measures will apply to preparations (including used oils) with a PCB/PCT content higher than 0·01 per cent. by weight.

The Council received an interim report on the Commission's review of the technological and economic implications of the proposed directive on the control of emissions from large combustion plants.

The Commission responded to my earlier requests with a statement on progress towards the integration of the environmental and agricultural policies in the Community. This work will be reflected in the "Green Paper", which the Commission intends to publish in July on the prospects for the CAP, for the purposes of public consultation. This will be followed by a full report on the subject of the integration of these policies to be given to the next meeting of the Environment Council in November.

I introduced a memorandum calling for Community action to encourage the widespread production and sale of decorative paint containing no deliberately added lead.

This was very favourably received and the Commission will examine the question and bring forward appropriate proposals for consideration by Ministers.

The Council formally adopted previously agreed directives on the assessment of the environmental effects of certain public and private projects and on containers of liquids for human consumption, and a decision on a Commission work programme concerning an experimental project for information on the state of the environment and natural resources in the Community. Other instruments adopted were a regulation to amend the protection given to cyclamen under a previous Council regulation implementing within the Community the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, and a decision on a supplement in respect of cadmium to the Convention of the Rhine against chemical pollution.

Housing (Multiple Occupation)

Mr. Ernie Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide grants to co-operatives composed of tenants in mansion blocks seeking to acquire an equity interest in the dwellings they occupy; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The Government have no such plans at present, but it is open to groups of tenants wishing to purchase the freehold of the mansion blocks in which they live to seek mortgage finance in the private sector.

Job Seekers (Housing)

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to improve housing prospects for prospective job seekers from the north obtaining employment in the south of England.

Sir George Young: Transfers between different areas have been facilitated by the national mobility scheme, the tenants exchange scheme and the right to exchange, all developed by this Government. The Government have now made available £3,051 million for investment in public housing in England, including £2,321 million for local authorities. It is for individual authorities to consider the housing needs in their areas including those of people seeking work.

Wild Birds (Habitat Conservation)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list those documents or papers he has received from the European Commission since 1 January 1984 which contain or refer to lists of sites in the United Kingdom which in the opinion of the Commission qualify for listing as special protection areas under directive 79/409 on the protection of wild bird habitats generally;

(2) if he will list any documents or papers which have been tabled or discussed at the Committee for the Adaptation on Technical and Scientific Progress established under directive 79/409 since 1 January 1984, which contain lists or refer to lists of sites in the United Kingdom which in the opinion of the European Community Commission qualify for listing as special protection areas under directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Under the rules of procedure of the committee for the adaptation on technical and scientific progress established under directive 79/409, its proceedings are confidential. No documents of the kind referred to have been received outside the committee.

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether local authorities which exceeded their expenditure limit as a result of making use of the technical and vocational education initiative related to in-service training support for the period 1985 to 1987 are liable to be rate-capped.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Approved schemes are funded in full by specific grant; expenditure will therefore not count as total expenditure for rate support grant purposes. It will therefore not affect authorities' liability to be selected for rate limitation.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the allowable expenditure and the actual expenditure of each metropolitan district or borough council under section 137 of the Local Government Act for the financial year 1983-84.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Following is the information based on returns made by local authorities:

Section 137 expediture limits and actual expenditure in 1983-84 (nearest £'000)

Metropolitan Districts	2p Rate Product	Actual Expenditure

Multi-storey Car Park (Bury St. Edmunds)

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how soon he expects to appoint an inspector to hear the appeal by Mr. John Wolton against the refusal of St. Edmundsbury council's planning consent for a multi-storey car park on the cattle market site in Bury St. Edmunds.

Mr. Macfarlane: My Department has not yet received an appeal from Mr. Wolton, but he was sent the appropriate forms on 2 July. An inspector could not be appointed in advance of an appeal being lodged, in fairness to other appellants.

London Borough of Newham

Mr. Nigel Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek the view of the Audit Commission concerning the validity of the financial return made to him by the London borough of Newham dated 17 October 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Questions about the validity of an authority's financial returns are essentially matters for discussion between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the authority concerned. In accordance with the usual arrangements, the Audit Commission was informed of his view that the London borough of Newham's financial return dated 17 October 1984 did not contain the best information available to him as to the council's total expenditure for 1982-83.

Residuary Body (Payments)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the provisions he has made for the making of payments by the residuary body to employers who offer persons employment, who, by virtue of sections 84, 94 and 95 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, will be precluded from becoming entitled to redundancy payments.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Subject to Parliament's approval of the relevant provision of the Local Government Bill, I shall shortly be issuing detailed proposals for consultation.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Cereal Prices (German Veto)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make urgent representations to the European Commission about its decision to override the German veto on cereal price reductions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Such action is not called for. The Commission has stated that its precautionary measures to prevent disruption of the rapeseed and cereals markets are without prejudice to the Council's final price decisions. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be pressing for price decisions to be taken at the Agriculture Council on 15-16 July.

DEFENCE

TriStar Aircraft (Conversion)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of Defence what progress has been made in the conversion to tanker aircraft by Marshalls Ltd. of Cambridge of six TriStar aircraft.

Mr. Butler: The conversion work undertaken by Marshalls Ltd. is proceeding and TriStar tankers are expected to enter service with the Royal Air Force early next year.

Nuclear Bases (Military Personnel)

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will revise the instructions given to military personnel guarding nuclear bases.

Mr. Stanley: We have no plans to do so.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the law relating to incitement to disaffection in so far as it relates to military personnel guarding nuclear bases.

Mr. Lee: No. The Incitement to Disaffection Act 1934 already adequately provides for proceedings to be taken, where appropriate, against those deliberately seeking to seduce any member of the armed forces from carrying out his duty.

Victoria Barracks

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest position on the programme for the rebuilding of Victoria barracks, Windsor.

Mr. Lee: Further to my answer of 27 March 1985, at column 249, I can now confirm that it is proposed to start the rebuild of Victoria barracks, Windsor, in December 1986 after detailed planning. The expected completion date is June 1989 following which the barracks will be occupied by a battalion of Foot Guards.

Royal Army Veterinary Corps (Melton Mowbray)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the future prospects and programme of work at the Royal Army Veterinary Corps unit at Melton Mowbray.

Mr. Lee: A review of dog training, carried out by a working party which included Army and RAF representatives, has recommended that the training of all service dogs should be undertaken by RAF Newton under the command of an RAVC officer. This means that the training of Army dogs currently undertaken at Melton Mowbray will be transferred to Newton by 1989.

The remaining activities of the RAVC at Melton Mowbray—the equine depot, equestrian training, the Army School of Farriery and the RAVC depot—are not affected by the recommendations of the working party. There are no plans to transfer these functions to any other location in the foreseeable future. The Army is grateful to the people of Melton Mowbray for the support which they have unfailingly given to the RAVC since the corps moved to the area in 1946, and for the pride which they have taken in the corps—pride exemplified by the grant to the corps in 1977 of the freedom of the borough. We look forward to the continuance of this happy relationship.

SCOTLAND

Labour Statistics

80. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many young people under the age of 25 years are currently unemployed in the Edinburgh travel-to-work area.

Mr. Allan Stewart: At 11 April 1985, the latest date for which information is available, there were 14,126 unemployed claimants under the age of 25 years in the Edinburgh travel-to-work area.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people came on to the unemployment register in Scotland during each month for the period 15 June 1984 to June 1985.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's letter of 22 October 1984. Information on the number of people becoming unemployed and claiming benefit during the periods requested is available in the Library.

Liquidations

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many Scottish companies went into liquidation during 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The numbers of liquidations notified for these years were published on page 58 of the Scottish Economic Bulletin, number 31, June 1985. Copies have been provided to hon. Members with constituencies in Scotland.

World Heritage

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, further to his reply of 2 July, Official Report, column 90, on the designation of World Heritage sites in Scotland, he will list those sites at present under consideration; and what criteria he is using to reach a decision on the selection of proposed sites.

Mr. Ancram: The criteria are those laid down by the World Heritage Committee in the document "Operational Guidelines for the implementation of the World Heritage convention". I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library. An announcement concerning sites will be made as soon as possible.

EC (Agriculture Regulation)

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland with whom he consulted outside Her Majesty's Government before accepting European Economic Community regulation 797/85.

Mr. Younger: Before European Economic Community regulation 797/85 was approved on 12 March I and my colleagues had the benefit of representations from a wide range of interests. Prior to its implementation I circulated a consultation paper to those listed below.

National Farmers Union for Scotland
Scottish Landowners Federation
The North of Scotland College of Agriculture
The West of Scotland Agricultural College
East of Scotland College of Agriculture
Crofters Commission
Countryside Commission for Scotland

SDP Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Group

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will implement European Economic Community regulation 797/85, relating to measures to improve the efficiency of agricultural structures.

Mr. Younger: The Government's decision on the implementation of European Economic Community Regulation 797/85 was announced yesterday in the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to a question by the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne).

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the implications for landowners of European Economic Community proposals for forestry under articles 15, 18, 20 and 22 of EEC regulation 797/85; and how the effect of this regulation compares with the present United Kingdom planting schemes, with particular reference to small hectarages.

Mr. Younger: The Government's decision on the implementation of EEC Regulation 797/85 was announced yesterday in the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to a Question by the hon. Member for Ilford South (Mr. Thorne).

With regard to articles 15, 18, 20 and 22 of the EEC Regulation, articles 18 and 22 comprise enabling provisions which have, at present, no forestry implications for landowners in the United Kingdom. The forestry provisions of article 15 will be considered in the next review, later this year, of economic conditions in the hills and uplands. It is not proposed to adopt a national scheme implementing the forestry provisions of article 20 and it is not possible, therefore, to make a direct comparison between this article's effects and those of the present United Kingdom planting schemes. The provision for shelter belts which exists under the present agricultural grant schemes will, however, be continued, with rates of grant of 15 per cent. for conifers and 30 per cent. for broadleaves. A higher grant of 60 per cent. will be paid in less-favoured areas.

Forestry

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Forestry Commission proposes to make any further changes to its broadleaves policy following the broadleaves in Britain review seminar held on 7 May; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Some alterations were made to the Forestry Commission's proposals as a result of views put forward at and following the seminar.

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to establish a permanent independent review body for teachers' pay and conditions conditional upon teachers accepting a no strike agreement and a package of pay and conditions for the ensuing year negotiated through the statutory negotiating machinery.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend and I would of course be pleased to examine any package on pay and conditions of service from the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education which included a no strike agreement. I understand that at least one teachers union would be prepared to discuss positively a no-strike agreement. But there seems no prospect that the largest union, the Educational Institute for Scotland which has pursued a policy of targetting strikes on constituencies represented by my right hon. and hon. Friends, would be prepared to consent to such an agreement. I see no case to change the existing statutory arrangements for determining teachers' salaries and conditions of service.

Psychotropic Drugs

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how may psychotropic drug prescriptions were written in 1984; and what percentage of the total were prescribed to females.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available.

Doctors

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many doctors there were in the National Health Service in Scotland in 1984; how many of the total were female; and how many female doctors were consultants or specialists.

Mr. John MacKay: At 30 September 1984 there were 10,508 (9,383 whole-time equivalent) doctors in the National Health Service in Scotland including hospital, community health and general practice; 2,704 (2,317·4 whole-time equivalent) were female of whom 242 (225 whole-time equivalent) were consultants or specialists in community medicine.

Cancer

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures in the Official Report of the number of deaths in 1984 in Scotland from (a) breast cancer and (b) cervical cancer.

Mr. John MacKay: The provisional figures are 1,248 (1,242 female and 6 male) and 227 (all female) respectively.

EMPLOYMENT

Greater Manchester

14. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many new jobs have been created within the Greater Manchester areas since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The precise information requested is not available. However, in the north west region the number of people employed decreased between 1979 and 1983 since when there has been a slight increase.

Wages Councils

15. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to announce his decision on the future of wages councils.

37. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to announce his decision on the future of wages councils.

45. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he intends to publish his decision on the future of wages councils.

52. Mr. Bob Edwards asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to announce his decision on the future of wages councils.

61. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of the wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A decision on the future of wages councils will be made when we have completed our study of the responses to the consultative paper.

Trade Union Bill

16. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to introduce a new Trade Union Bill.

26. Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce further legislation on trade unions.

38. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce further legislation on trade unions.

47. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce further legislation on trade unions.

Mr. Tom King: I am considering what further steps might be taken to carry forward our successful programme of trade union reform.

Labour Statistics

17. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were out of work in the Staffordshire Moorlands parliamentary constituency at the most recent count; and what was the comparable figure for the same area in the same month in 1974.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in the Staffordshire Moorlands constituency was 3,450. Statistics of unemployment for parliamentary constituencies are derived from the new ward-based system and are available only from June 1983 when it is estimated that unemployment was 3,524.

18. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many men and women were in (a) full-time and (b) part-time employment in 1979 and at the latest available date in 1985.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest available information is from the labour force survey conducted in the spring of 1984. A comparison with the survey conducted in the spring of 1979 is contained in the following table:

	*Employees Full-time		*Great Britain: Thousands Part-time
	Male	Female	Male	Female
Spring 1979	12,866	5,301	239	3,651
Spring 1984	11,197	5,016	452	3,959

* An employee is shown as full-time or part-time according to whether the employee considers the job as a full-time or part-time job.

19. Mr. Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the work force was unemployed in April 1979; and what is the proportion unemployed at the present time.

Mr. Tom King: On 13 June 1985, the unemployment rate in the United Kingdom was 13·1 per cent. The estimate for April 1979 was 5·2 per cent.

22. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what was the figure in April 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985 the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 1,334,000. The corresponding number of unemployed registrants in April 1979 was 367,000.

23. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,179,000, which represents an unemployment rate of 13·1 per cent.

27. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the total number of the working population in employment; and how this figure compares with two years before.

Mr. Alan Clark: In December 1984, the latest date for which information is available, the employed labour force in the United Kingdom (i.e. employees in employment plus the self-employed plus Her Majesty's Forces) was estimated as 24,185,000. The corresponding figure for December 1982 was 23,642,000.

29. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently in work in the United Kingdom; and what were the figures for May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: In December 1984, the latest date for which information is available the employed labour force in the United Kingdom (i.e. employees in employment plus the self-employed plus Her Majesty's Forces) was estimated as 24,156,000. The corresponding figure for June 1979 (figures are not available for May) was 25,356,000. The figures have been adjusted to take account of seasonal variations.

30. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what was the figure in April 1979.

40. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest number of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what was the figure in May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 1,334,161. It is difficult to make a comparison with May 1979 because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982, and the 1983 Budget provisions for certain men, mainly aged over 60, who are no longer required to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits. The number of registrants who had been unemployed for over 12 months in May 1979 was 366,711.

31. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the work-force was unemployed in May 1979; and what is the proportion unemployed at the present time.

54. Mr. Torney asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the work force was unemployed in May 1979; and what is the proportion unemployed at the present time.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985, the unemployment rate in the United Kingdom was 13·1 per cent., and the corresponding estimate for May 1979 was 5 per cent. The comparison is affected by the 1983 Budget provisions which meant that some men, mainly aged 60 years and over, no longer had to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits.

39. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the estimated rate of unemployment among men over 50 years of age; and how many have been unemployed for over 12 months at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available, the estimated rate of unemployment for men aged over 50 years in the United Kingdom was 14·0 per cent. This figure is provisional. The number of male claimants in this age group who had been unemployed for over one year was 247,600.

43. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the present number of people under the age of 25 years out of work in the Greater London area.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available, the number of unemployed claimants in Greater London under the age of 25 years was 140,437.

46. Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers unemployed; and what this is as a proportion of the work force.

59. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current level of unemployment.

66. Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers unemployed; and what this is as a proportion of the work force.

75. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers unemployed; and what this is as a proportion of the work force.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,178,582, which corresponds to an unemployment rate of 13·1 per cent.

49. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of people who have been unemployed for more than 52 weeks.

63. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what this is as a percentage of those registered unemployed.

64. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people who have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what this is as a percentage of those registered unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over one year was 1,334,161 which was 40·8 per cent. of the total.

55. Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people in Birmingham who have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what this is as a percentage of those registered unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 April 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the Birmingham local authority district who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 46,813, which was 51·8 per cent. of all claimants in that area.

71. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on his estimate of the numbers who are working who are not currently counted by his Department as being employed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department's estimates of employment are intended to be comprehensive and it is not possible to count the numbers who have been excluded but are working.

77. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current level of unemployment in Thurrock.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in Thurrock parliamentary constituency was 5,643.

78. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the employment areas which have over 2,000 people registered as unemployed and where the rate of unemployment exceeds 15 per cent.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985, the total number of unemployed claimants exceeded 2,000 and the unemployment rate exceeded 15 per cent. in the following travel-to-work areas of Great Britain:

Skill Shortages

21. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations he has received about skill shortages in British industry.

36. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations he has received about skill shortages in British industry.

73. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations he has received about skill shortages in British industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: During the past three months my right hon. Friend and I have received a number of letters relating primarily to skill shortages. We are aware of current concern about shortages in particular areas and the subject is kept under close review. Regular reports are compiled by the Manpower Services Commission, which takes these into account when formulating its local and national programmes.

44. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Employment if skill shortage figures are collected centrally by his Department.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission regularly collects information relating to skill shortages from a number of sources including surveys carried out by the Confederation of British Industry, Professional and Executive Recruitment survey of employers' needs, the survey of long duration vacancies at jobcentres and others.

Employment Schemes (Glanford and Scunthorpe)

24. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the measures which his Department has taken to promote employment schemes in Glanford and Scunthorpe under the youth training scheme and community programme and other programmes; how much has been spent; and how many people have benefited thereby.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In Glanford and Scunthorpe, as elsewhere, we aim to ensure that people are fully aware of the opportunities available under the Government's training and employment measures. The numbers covered by these measures and the costs are set out in my earlier reply to my hon. Friend on 2 July at columns 143-146.

Hotel and Catering Industry

25. Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to how many non-United Kingdom citizens are at present working in the hotel and catering industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: Results of the labour force survey conducted in the spring of 1984 indicate that there were some 70,000 people employed in the hotel and catering industry in the United Kingdom who were not British citizens.

Suffolk

28. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to reduce the level of unemployment in Suffolk.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government is committed to maintaining its economic policies which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing while encouraging enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. That is the only way to generate lasting jobs in Suffolk and elsewhere. In the meantime we are spending well over £2 billion this year on a range of employment and training measures to help the unemployed, which are currently benefiting well over 5,000 people in Suffolk.

Youth Training Scheme

32. Mr. Foster asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest estimated proportion of youth training scheme leavers finding employment.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission conducts a regular survey of youth training scheme leavers. Questionnaires are sent to 15 per cent. of leavers some three months after they leave the scheme. The latest information, which is available in the Library, covers young people who left the scheme in October 1984. This shows that 49 per cent. were in work, 9 per cent. on another youth training scheme, 1 per cent. on a full-time course at a college or training centre, 1 per cent. were back at school, 38 per cent. were unemployed and 2 per cent. were doing something else.

The decrease in the proportion in work, compared to results of surveys for previous months, reflects partly the seasonal reduction in the recruitment activity of employers and partly the considerably lower number of those who left the youth training scheme in October 1984, many of them before they had completed a full period of training. A much more comprehensive picture is provided by the survey of those leaving the scheme between July and September 1984, the peak leaving period, which shows that some 60 per cent. went into employment and about two thirds went into work or full-time education or training.

34. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment what additional funds will be available from the European Economic Community to finance the second year of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Financial support from the European Community for the second year of the youth training scheme will depend on the extent to which the European Commission decides that it meets their priorities for assistance from the European social fund.

50. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to counteract the decline in the number of youth training scheme leavers who find employment.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The most comprehensive picture to date of those leaving the youth training scheme remains the survey of those leaving the scheme between July and September 1984. Almost half the 1984 leavers left the scheme during that period. The survey showed that some 60 per cent. went into employment and about two-thirds went into employment or full-time education and training. It can be highly misleading to look at a single month's figures in isolation because of seasonal and cyclical factors. The youth training scheme is a high quality scheme offering those who go on it a real opportunity to improve their employment prospects.

62. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the retention rate among young people on youth training scheme programmes on Merseyside.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information based on a 15 per cent. sample of young people in the Manpower Services Commission's Merseyside inner and outer areas who left the youth training scheme between July and September 1984 (when almost half 1984 leavers left the scheme) shows that, at the time of the survey, 43 per cent. were in work, 6 per cent. on a full-time course at a college or training centre, 1 per cent. back at school and 7 per cent. on another youth training scheme programme. Of the remainder, 41 per cent. were unemployed and 2 per cent. doing something else.

68. Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what will be the principal differences between year two and year one of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The usual pattern is likely to be broad-based foundation training in the first year, followed by more specific vocational training in the second.

72. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received concerning the proposed two-year youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) earlier today.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment to what factors he attributes the increase in the latest figures for drop-outs from the youth training scheme, and for those who, having completed the scheme, return to unemployment.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Results from the Manpower Services Commission's regular monthly survey of young people who have left the youth training scheme are in the Library. The latest results, for leavers in October 1984, indicate that a higher proportion of the sample left the scheme early, and show a fall in the percentage in jobs, compared with the figures for July-September 1984.

However, as the following figures show, this does not indicate an underlying increase in the proportion of young people who leave the scheme early:

1984	Numbers in training at month end (000's)	Number of early leavers in month (000's)	Early leavers as per cent. of in training
June	249·9	6·3	3
July	283·2	5·4	2
August	292·0	7·0	2
September	310·5	7·4	2
October	316·1	7·5	2
November	311·7	8·2	3
December	301·9	3·6	1

As I explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 21 June, at column 230, the decrease in the proportion in work shown in the survey of October 1984 leavers, compared with results of surveys for previous months, reflects partly the seasonal reduction in the recruitment activity of employers and partly the lower number of those who left the youth training scheme in that month.

A much more comprehensive picture is provided by the survey of those leaving the scheme between July and September 1984, the peak leaving period, which shows that some 60 per cent. went into employment and about two thirds went into work or full-time education or training.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many youth training scheme leavers go on to further formal work-based training provided by employers in each region and in each industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the effectiveness of the youth training scheme is being measured on a national basis.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Community Programme

33. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the development of the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The community programme is being expanded by 100,000 places to 230,000 filled placed by end of May 1986; 50,000 of these additional places should be available by the end of this year.

42. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the progress of the discussions to implement the extension of the community programme announced in the Budget.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend asked the Manpower Services Commission for their views on the best means of distributing the additional places and for detailed proposals for the experiments announced in the Budget. He has now received them and is now considering their reply, and will make a statement in due course.

65. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with the operation of the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Yes, although we are continually seeking means of improving the effectiveness and efficiency of the programme.

70. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any plans to extend community programme places beyond 230,000.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No. Our plan is to expand the community programme by 100,000 places to 230,000 filled places by the end of May 1986. We keep all employment and training measures under review.

New Labour

35. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment which sectors of employment have shown the greatest tendency in the last 12 months to attract and absorb new labour.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics, but an indication of the net changes can be seen by comparing levels of employees in employment at different dates. The following tables list those industries in Great Britain which have shown the greatest increase in the actual number of employees in employment, and those which have increased most in percentage terms, between December 1983 and December 1984. The full list of industries, analysed according to the 1980 standard industrial classification, from which these tables are compiled are those given in table 1.4 of the labour market data section of Employment Gazette, copies of which are in the Library.

Extraction of mineral oil and natural gas (Activity 1300)
Dealing in scrap and waste materials (Class 62)
Manufacture of domestic-type electric appliances (Activity 3460)

Leicester

41. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current rate of unemployment in the city of Leicester.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985, the rate of unemployment in the Leicester travel-to-work area was 10·9 per cent. Unemployment rates are not available for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas.

Worker Participation Schemes

48. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied that sufficient progress is being made to improve worker participation in accordance with section 1 of the Employment Act 1982.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on 10 June at column 362.

Job Seekers (House Changes)

51. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he keeps statistics on the number of people who have moved house to secure employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available in the form requested. Results of the labour force survey conducted in the spring of 1984 indicate that some 760,000 people of working age had moved at some time within the previous 12 months because of their job or to look for work. This figure includes those who moved with an existing employer as well as those who moved to try and find a job.

School Leavers

53. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of school leavers now registered as unemployed in the parliamentary constituency of Brent, South; what is the number previously registered who have found employment during the last six months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 13 June 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the parliamentary constituency of Brent South who have not had employment since leaving full-time education was 618, of which 112 were aged under 18 years. While figures showing the numbers of people ceasing to be unemployed are compiled, these are not yet available by parliamentary constituencies for the past six months, and the figures do not distinguish those finding jobs.

Strikes (Postal Ballots)

56. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will now consider introducing compulsory secret postal ballots before strike action.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am not aware of any factors arising from strike ballots held under the provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 which should cause the House to seek to depart from the statutory requirements which were laid down only last year. Under the Act pre-strike ballots must be held which, so far as is reasonably practicable, provide every member concerned with the opportunity to vote either by post or at the workplace, or a place more convenient to the member, immediately before, immediately after, or during his working hours. In any case, provision must be made for voting in secret by the marking of a ballot paper, for freedom from interference and for fair and accurate counting of the votes.

Unions which refuse to consult their members, or do so by show of hands at mass meetings, now lose their legal immunity, and they have learnt that lesson. Because our requirements are seen to be fair and flexible, and appropriate to the local and ephemeral character of most decisions on industrial action, they have won acceptance. To insist on postal balloting for this purpose, with the inevitable administrative burden and delays which it involves, would risk encouraging a return to the old days of unofficial, wild-cat strikes.

Self-employed Persons

57. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the latest number of people who are now self-employed.

Mr. Alan Clark: There were an estimated 2,557,000 self-employed persons in the United Kingdom in December 1984.

Employees (References)

58. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to prevent employers giving factual references to employees which have the effect of preventing those employees from obtaining further employment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. I do not think that it would be either practicable or desirable to seek to prevent employers from giving and receiving the information which they require to make a decision on whether to employ a particular individual.

Fairground Accidents

60. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce new measures to seek to reduce the number of fairground accidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am concerned about the serious accidents that have happened at fairgrounds in recent weeks. The Health and Safety at Work Act 1974 applies to fairgrounds. The code of safe practice at fairs, which was published last April, gives clear and comprehensive guidance to fairground operators and others on what the act requires of them. The code is being used to considerable effect to raise safety standards. Its provisions enable the Act to be readily enforced where necessary. New measures are not being proposed at present.

Trade Unions (Exclusion)

67. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether Her Majesty's Government intend to reconsider their policy towards the exclusion of trade unions from certain places such as the Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham, in the light of comments by the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. Tom King: No. Our action at GCHQ was consistent with our obligations under International Labour Organisation conventions and we do not intend to change our policy; nor do we intend extending the measures in force at GCHQ beyond those agencies whose primary functions are concerned with security and intelligence.

Women (Equal Pay)

69. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will introduce legislation to ensure greater equality of remuneration for women compared to men.

Mr. Alan Clark: Our legislation already provides for women to be paid equally with men when they are doing the same work or work of equal value. I hope that the Equal Opportunities Commission's code of practice, which came into operation on 30 April, will help to improve women's access to higher level jobs in the future.

Knitwear Operators

74. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with the availability and adequacy of training for skilled and semi-skilled knitwear operators on a national basis; and to what he attributes any local shortages.

Mr. Peter Morrison As I said in my reply to my hon. Friend on 11 June at column 406, I am aware that the hosiery and knitwear industry is reporting recruitment difficulties. Any form of trained labour shortage is a cause for concern but it is primarily for the industry itself to train sufficient people to meet its own requirements for skilled and semi-skilled employees. I have sent my hon. Friend a copy of the Manpower Services Commission report on difficulties being experienced in the Leicestershire area which I referred to in my previous reply, and I recently met him and my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) to discuss its conclusions, which are being followed up with local employers.

Job Vacancies

76. Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the most recent figures for the total number of job vacancies at careers offices in Great Britain; and what is the ratio of vacancies to unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 7 June 1985, there were 15,015 unfilled vacancies at careers offices in Great Britain. Valid ratios of vacancies to unemployment cannot be calculated because many vacancies for which young people are eligible are not notified to careers offices. For example, many young people find employment through jobcentres.

Training Organisations

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) which non-statutory training organisations have board or equivalent level membership for relevant trade union or education representatives; and which are governed solely by employer representatives;

(2) if he will provide figures showing the overall operating budgets of industry training boards and non-statutory training organisations in 1984-85, distinguishing industry funding from Manpower Services Commission funding;

(3) if he will detail which industry training boards and non-statutory training organisations currently operate more than three offices and training centres nationally; and if he will state how many they operate, and the number of industry training board offices and training centres which have closed since 1981, for each industry training board;

(4) if he will give figures for the number of staff employed by industry training boards in 1979 and by industry training boards and non-statutory training organisations together in 1984, broken down into permanent staff and staff funded on a 12-month basis by the Manpower Services Commission;

(5) what are the current arrangements for monitoring the provision by employers of post youth training scheme training and the match of this training to skill requirements;

(6) how the effectiveness of the non-statutory training organisations which replaced some industry training boards in predicting, measuring and meeting their industry's needs, is being measured.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Manpower Services Commission

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give details of the composition by sex and ethnic group for the following staff of the Manpower Services Commission: (a) staff based in Sheffield, (b) area office personnel and for the skillcentre training agency as follows: (i) skillcentre managers and staff, (ii) all other staff.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Staff numbers are not available in precisely the form requested. The programme of surveys to record the ethnic origin of staff has not yet been completed. The numbers of staff of each sex in post on 1 April 1985 in the nearest available groups to those requested are as follows:

	Male	Female
Manpower Services Commission staff
(a) Head Office staff based at Sheffield	1,263·0	854·5
(b) Area Office personnel (including, for Training Division, regional office staff	2,743·5	2,930·0
Skillcentre Training Agency (STA) staff*
(i) Skillcentre managers and staff	2,901·0	565·0
(ii) Operations managers office staff	88·0	44·0

* STA Head Office staff are included in the staff based in Sheffield.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail by sex and ethnic group the number of persons who in 1984-85 completed the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information is not available in the exact form requested. However, a total of 22,933 men and 4,696 women joined the enterprise allowance scheme between August 1983 when the national scheme started and March 1984, and were due to complete their 52 weeks in the financial year 1984-85. In addition, 36,699 men and 9,368 women joined the scheme in 1984-85. No information is recorded on the ethnic origin of scheme participants.

Adult Training

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many local collaborative projects are currently being funded as part of the adult training strategy (a) in each region and (b) in each industry sector; and what is the level of employer funding involved.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The local collaborative projects programme is run jointly by the Manpower Services Commission and Education Departments. The number of projects approved to date by region and industry sector are set out in the tables.

Those involved in a local collaborative project, both employers and providers of training, are required to contribute substantially to the total costs of the project. This contribution can be in the form of staff time, accommodation, clerical and administrative support, as well as by financial contributions. I regret that to quantify the level of contributions to these projects would involve disproportionate cost.

Professional and Executive Recruitment Service

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will consider privatising the Professional and Executive Recruitment Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) on 2 April, at column 543.

Household Expenditure

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the most recent available estimates from the family expenditure survey on average expenditure of (i) all households and (ii) households with incomes below £150 per week on fuel, light and power, food, clothing and footwear, and durable household goods for the following types: (a) single person, (b) married couple, (c) married couple with one child, (d) married couple with two children, (e) married couple with three children and (f) three adult household; and if he will also update these estimates to May 1985 and November 1985 using the retail prices index and Government assumptions or projections for price movements.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985]: The most recent information from the family expenditure survey relates to 1983 and is set out in the following table.

Average weekly household expenditure (£)

Category of expenditure	One adult	One man, one woman	One man, one woman, one child	One man, one woman, two children	One man, one woman, three children	Three adults

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rates

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total cost of issuing summonses by the Department of the Environment rating division for the non-payment of rates in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The estimated cost of issuing summonses is as follows and is more complete than the information which I gave the hon. Gentleman in my reply of 15 May 1985 at column 148.

1982-83	52,200
1983-84	109,000
1984-85	214,800

Costs for 1980-81 and 1981-82 are not readily available.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the further development of services for kidney patients in Northern Ireland with particular regard to the feasibility of providing dialysis units outside Belfast.

Mr. Chris Patten: The review of renal services which is being carried out by the Department of Health and Social Services in consultation with the Health and Social Services Boards is continuing and is expected to be completed within the next few months.

Border Checkpoints (Arrests)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many people have been arrested in each of the past five years and the first half of the current year at each of the border checkpoints in Derry district;

(2) how many people have been taken to Fort George or the Strand road barracks from each of the border checkpoints in the Derry district; and how many such people were subsequently arrested in each of the past five years and the first half of the current year.

Mr. Scott: The information sought is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

District Heating Rebates

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give further consideration to the payment of interest on district heating rebates to Northern Ireland Housing Executive tenants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. The executive has indicated that it is not its policy to pay interest on district heating rebates or to charge interest on district heating surcharges.

Student Travel Awards

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why students in the Western Board area lose out most under the flat-rate scheme of student travel awards.

Mr. Scott: A higher proportion of Western area board students study away from home, in particular, at institutions in Great Britain.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why the recent Department of Education for Northern Ireland survey into the effects of the flat-rate scheme for students travel awards included those students who are on minimum awards and who are not included in the scheme which was being investigated.

Mr. Scott: Full value awards include an element for travel expenses. The amount paid to each student is determined by deducting the parental contribution, if any, from the assessed award. The same rules apply to all students and, therefore, all students were included in the travel grant survey.

Salmon Stocks

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, following the destruction of boats at Londonderry in an arson attack, what steps he has taken to protect the salmon stocks of the Foyle system and of the north coast salmon fishery from poachers.

Dr. Boyson: No fishery protection craft were damaged in the fire at the Foyle Fishery Commission's premises on 9 June 1985, and fishery protection patrols have not been affected.

Criminal Injuries (Compensation)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to publish his proposals for amending the Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (N.I.) Order 1977; and at what date he intends that the new provisions shall be used as a basis for compensation.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to he hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Photocopying Equipment

Mr. Beith asked the Lord Privy Seal what are the capital running, maintenance and other costs to public funds, other than funds voted specifically for the use of opposition parties in Parliament, of photocopying equipment supplied to the parliamentary Labour party.

Mr. Biffen: As part of the parliamentary facilities made available to the official Opposition, financial provision is made for photocopying equipment to be rented for their use at the annual charge of £1,124.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has decided on changes to the immigration rules to comply with the recent judgment of the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Brittan: Yes. In order to comply with the judgment it will be necessary to change the immigration rules so that the provisions for the admission of husbands and wives for settlement are brought into line with each other. The Government therefore propose to allow husbands to join women who, though not British citizens, have permanent residence here, and to apply to wives seeking admission for settlement (other than wives to whom the provisions of section 1(5) of the Immigration Act 1971 apply) the requirements, including the requirement to satisfy the entry clearance officer that the marriage was not entered into primarily for immigration purposes, which at present apply only to husbands. The opportunity will be taken to clarify and strengthen the provisions of the existing rules relating to maintenance and accommodation and the entry clearance officer will need to be satisfied that adequate accommodation will be available for the partners to a marriage, and for any children, and that they will be able to maintain themselves without recourse to public funds.

Similar changes, including the introduction of an entry certificate requirement for fiancees, will be made to bring the provisions for the admission of fiances and fiancees into line with each other.

I am satisfied that these changes, taken together, will enable us to comply with the judgment in a way that preserves the firm and fair immigration control to which the Government remain fully committed. I intend to lay before Parliament on 15 July a statement of the necessary changes to the immigration rules to give effect to these decisions.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications from (a) husbands and (b) fiances have been (i) decided, (ii) granted and (iii) refused in the Indian subcontinent in each quarter of 1984; how many such applications in each category and for each quarter were refused; (1) wholly and (2) partly because of the primary purpose rules; what was the refusal rate in each instance and what percentage of these refusals was (x) wholly and (y) partly on primary purpose grounds; and if he will publish this information for each post.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 25 June 1985, c. 344-45]: The information requested is given in the tables. Where the numbers are small, the figures for individual posts and individual quarters have been combined. Information for the whole of the Indian subcontinent on husbands and fiances granted or refused entry clearance is given in table 9 of the quarterly Home Office statistical bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics—First Quarter 1985" (Issue 16/85).

Data Protection Act 1984

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will appoint a day for registration under the Data Protection Act 1984 to commence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I have today made an order under section 42(1) of the Data Protection Act 1984 appointing 11 November 1985 as the day on which applications for registration under the Act may begin to be made. Data users will have six months from that date within which to apply for registration.

This date has been appointed after consultation with the Data Protection Registrar, who, since his appointment last September, has concentrated his efforts on setting up his office and devising procedures for registration. With this in mind, he has held meetings with a wide range of representative organisations and has taken account of the views which they have expressed. He has also published advice and information about the Act. Details of his activities during the last nine months are set out in his first annual report, which was presented to Parliament yesterday and which is published today (HC 470).

Sporting Events (Crowd Safety)

76. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has made any study of the influence of politically extreme organisations upon crowd safety at major sporting events in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 18 June, at column 88.

Anti-apartheid March (Surveillance)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about whether the Metropolitan police used (a) an empty office at Strutton Ground SW1, (b) the roof of the New Scotland Yard building, and (c) the roof of the British Pharmaceutical building in Lambeth road, for the purpose of camera surveillance of the anti-apartheid march on 16 June; what was the total number of police personnel involved in camera surveillance of this march, and what branches of the Metropolitan police they were from; and whether any still photographs were taken by the Metropolitan police of the march.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that seven cameras were used at various locations along the route of the march including the roof of New Scotland Yard and the British Pharmaceutical building. No cameras were sited in Strutton Ground. The cameras, which were used for traffic control and to assist in police deployment, were operated by 19 civilian engineers from the chief engineer's department of the Metropolitan police. No still photographs were taken.

Terrorism (Italy)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Italian Government about the presence in the United Kingdom of people wanted for terrorist offences in Italy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: None. It would be for the Italian authorities to apply for the extradition of any individuals in the United Kingdom who were suspected of terrorist offences in Italy.

Child Abduction Act 1984

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's guidelines on the enforcement of the Child Abduction Act 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Copies of Home Office circular 75/1985, which explains the main provisions of the Child Abduction Act 1984, have been placed in the Library.

Strangeways Prison

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners, including people on remand, were detained at Strangeways gaol in Manchester on 8 July.

Mr. Mellor: On 5 July, the latest date for which figures were collected centrally, the population of Her Majesty's prison Manchester was 1,733.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in Strangeways gaol, Manchester, are registrably either mentally or physically disabled.

Mr. Mellor: On 31 March 1985 the numbers of persons in Manchester prison whom the medical officer considered to be mentally disordered within the meaning of the Mental Health Act 1983, was 13, of whom 12 were mentally ill. There are at present three inmates whom the medical officer considers to be physically handicapped.

European Cup Final, Brussels

Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to ensure that British football fans who were at the Liverpool v. Juventus match in Brussels and who are liable to be charged with offences, and are at present in Great Britain, are not extradited to Belgium to stand trial.

Mr. Mellor: No. Extradition arrangements with Belgium are provided for by the United Kingdom/Belgium extradition treaty. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made it clear on 3 June, at columns 22-23, that, in accordance with our international obligations, we will give the Belgium authorities every assistance in preparing requests for the extradition of persons accused of having committed offences at the European Cup final.

Civil Defence

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state, for each of the financial years from 1980-81 to 1987-88, the actual or projected figures for (a) total civil defence expenditure from his Department's budget and (b) expenditure on grants-in-aid to local authorities for civil defence purposes.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 5 July 1985, c. 282]: The figures are as follows:

	(a) Total Expenditure (Net) (£'000)*	(b) Grant in Aid to Local Authorities (£'000)
1980-81 outturn	12,227	4,546
1981-82 outturn	16,443	6,160
1982-83 outturn	26,755	7,162
1983-84 outturn	36,979	9,406
1984-85 estimated outturn	41,420	11,132
1985-86 supply estimate	44,279	11,989
1986-87 projected figure	45,140	13,736
1987-88 projected figure	45,070	15,468

* Includes expenditure on major Home Office building projects undertaken by PSA.

Ferry Passengers

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for each United Kingdom seaport, and at each separate terminal within a seaport, what was the number of passengers arriving in 1984 on a ferry, including hovercraft and hydrofoils, from a seaport in (a) another member state of the Community and (b) other countries.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have been asked to reply.

The following table shows the information requested for United Kingdom ports or port groups. The Department of Transport does not collect figures for arrivals at individual terminals. Figures for individual ports have been grouped where necessary to avoid the disclosure of commercially confidential information.

Sea passenger arrivals in the United Kingdom from Continental Europe and Irish Republic: 1984*

Port Port Group	Arrivals in United Kingdom (Thousands)
Dover	6,881
Other Thames and Kent ports	1,540
All Thames and Kent (Tilbury to Folkstone)	8,421

From Non-EC Countries	237

* Excludes passengers arriving in the United Kingdom from outside Europe and passengers dis-embarking following a cruise holiday.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Attorney-General what manpower reductions the Lord Chancellor's Department has achieved in 1984-85.

The Attorney-General: In the period between the 1 April 1984 and 1 April 1985 the number of counted staff increased from 10,026 to 10,190. This increase was due to the transfer from other departments of 61 staff of two tribunals and to the need to recruit additional staff to deal with the increasing workload of the courts.

Mr. Ed Kale

Mr. Alton asked the Attorney-General, what action the Director of Public Prosecutions has taken so far to seek to extradite Mr. Ed Kale from the United States of America.

The Solicitor-General: I understand the question to refer to the removal by Edward William Kale in September 1980 of his two children from their home in Liverpool to the United States of America in defiance of a custody order made in favour of his former wife. The matter was referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions who concluded that no criminal offence was disclosed. Extradition is not available in respect of alleged contempt of court. Although the law has been amended by the Child Abduction Act 1984, its provisions are not retrospective in effect and accordingly do not provide any basis for an application for extradition in relation to events occuring in 1980.

I also understand that one child was returned to the jurisdiction, but recently was again removed to the United States of America. This is the subject of an investigation by the Merseyside police, who expect shortly to submit a report to the Director.

PRIME MINISTER

Pensions

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister in what circumstances Her Majesty's Government decide to base pension entitlement on levels of salary other than those actually in payment at or in the period before the date of retirement; for which categories of public servants this was done in 1983-84 and succeeding years; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Since April 1983 the only group of public servants who have had their pensions based on salaries other than those actually in payment at or in the period before the date of retirement are those whose pensions were affected by the 1983-84 TSRB award. Ministers are considering the 1985 report of the Top Salaries Review Body and I expect to be able to announce the Government's decisions, including the implications for pensions, in the near future.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the average pay rise for teachers and what was the annual inflation rate in each year from 1955; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: So far as it can be ascertained, the information requested is given in the table.

Annual pay settlements operative from 1 April have been the norm only since 1969 (though the figures for 1974 and 1980 represent a consolidation of separate settlements applicable from two or more dates during those years). Increases prior to 1969 are attributed in the table to the years in which they become operative. These early figures are approximations giving a broad indication only of the average effect of pay settlements, which covered periods of up to three years.

The RPI increases given are for the 12 months up to April each year.

Neuropathogens Laboratory, Edinburgh University

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what payments he has made in the last year to the neuropathogens laboratory at Edinburgh university, Kings Buildings, for work on dementia.

Mr. Brooke: The neuropathogenesis unit in Edinburgh is jointly funded by the Agricultural and Food Research Council and the Medical Research Council, which receive grants-in-aid from the Department. I understand that in the financial year 1984-85 expenditure at the unit on work directly concerned with dementia was estimated to be about £19,000. In addition, much of the unit's total budget of £510,000 was directed to work which might prove relevant to understanding of diseases such as dementia.

Religious Education

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has in the context of the proposals contained in the White Paper, "Better Teaching" on in-service training for teachers, to strengthen the teaching of religious education in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The new funding arrangements for in-service training proposed in the White Paper "Better Schools" are intended to promote more systematic procedures for identifying teachers' needs for training, for matching training needs with suitable training activities and for making good use of teachers after training. Such improved procedures should serve to strengthen teaching in religious education as in other subjects.

Grammar Schools

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards selection of children at age of 11 years, and towards grammar schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: The White Paper "Better Schools" explains (paragraph 212) that the Government are content with the existing legal framework "which gives freedom to each local education authority to maintain its existing pattern of school organisation and, if it wishes, to propose changes in that pattern".

Using this freedom, some LEAs continue to maintain selective secondary schools. The freedom to submit statutory proposals to reintroduce grammar schools was restored by the Education Act 1979. If such proposals were submitted, I would consider them on their merits.

ENERGY

National Coal Board

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will indicate the total level of Government financial support under all headings to the National Coal Board in (a) the last five years and (b) the last 10 years.

Mr. David Hunt: Total Government financial support during the last five years and 10 years in payments of deficit, operating and social grants to the National Coal Board, and payments under the RMP scheme to redundant mineworkers were as follows:

	£ million
1975-76 to 1984-85	6,157
1980-81 to 1984-85	5,450

Photovoltaic Renewable Energy Sources

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are his proposals for future funding of research into photovoltaic renewable energy sources.

Mr. David Hunt: Support for the exploitation of the market for photovoltaic technology rests with the Department of Trade and Industry, which is providing assistance for industrial innovation in photovoltaics as well as advice and assistance to British firms under its various development and export-related schemes.

My Department does, however, consider that photovoltaic technology is unlikely to be economic for electricity generation in this country because of our climatic conditions, but recognises that there is a growing export market.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Anti-misting Kerosene

Mr. Michael McNair Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department is involved in the research programme instigated by the American Federal Aviation Authority to produce anti-misting kerosene; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Research aimed at developing an anti-misting additive for aviation kerosene was started in the United Kingdom in 1967. For some years this research, at the Royal Aircraft Establishment and in a number of firms and universities, was jointly supported by my Department and the Ministry of Defence. In 1978, a memorandum of understanding (MOU) was established between the American Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) and the MOD(PE) covering a joint research programme based on the ICI additive "Avgard" and leading to the controlled impact demonstration (CID) in the United States of America on 1 December last year. Although the result of the CID has cast doubt on the benefits of anti-misting fuels, the MOU remains in being. The current research by ICI is funded by the company, but my officials continue to support ICI in its dealings with the FAA, who are still analysing the results of the CID and considering future developments.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Butcher: The number of staff in the Department has increased from 12,582 on April 1 1984 to 12,620 on April 1 1985. This net figure reflects a number of structural changes involving transfer of work into and out of the Department; staff savings from increased efficiency, general streamlining and contracting out of services; and increases in staff to deal with increased workload at the Companies Registration Office, and elsewhere.

Paint Strippers

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department has commissioned publicity to draw attention to the dangers of using caustic soda and other paint strippers; and if he will make it his policy that these products should carry a health warning.

Mr. Fletcher: I have been asked to reply.

The Classification Packaging and Labelling of Dangerous Substances Regulations 1984, which come into force next year and to which the Government will give appropriate publicity, prescribe warning labelling for all products such as paint strippers which contain corrosive, toxic or harmful chemicals, so that users will know to take care. I am also proposing to prescribe child resistant closures for certain household chemicals including caustic or harmful paint strippers.

Pasta

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action the European Community has taken in response to the United States' threats affecting pasta imports from the European Community to the United States; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tebbit: On 20 June, the United States Government announced their intention to impose greatly increased duties on imports of pasta from the Community. This has been explained as a response to the Community's failure to grant the United States satisfaction in a current dispute concerning trade in citrus products. As the latter dispute remains the subject of normal dispute settlement procedures in the GATT, the United States action represents a unilateral resort to restrictive measures not authorised by the GATT. This is unacceptable conduct on the part of a major trading nation and serves only to undermine confidence in the multilateral trading system.

The Council of Ministers has adopted a regulation permitting the Community to take appropriate counter-measures. If the United States implements the increased duties, the Community will increase duties on imports from the United States of lemons and unshelled walnuts. We calculate the trade impact of this measure to be equivalent to that resulting from the United States action. I regret the need to take this step and hope that it will not be necessary to implement the regulation. Together with our partners, we remain eager to negotiate with the United States in order to resolve our underlying differences without recourse to a harmful escalation of the dispute.

It was necessary to signal urgently to the United States authorities the Community's willingness to take counter-measures. The regulation had therefore to be adopted by the Council of Ministers at very short notice. Accordingly, we were not able to provide an explanatory memorandum in time for the Select Committee on European Legislation to consider the proposal before it was adopted by the council. I wrote to the Chairman of the Committee explaining what was happening and why. I regret that this was necessary and a full explanatory memorandum has now been sent to the Committee.

West Germany

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the value of imports and exports of manufactures from and to Germany each year since 1970 and in 1985 to date at an annual rate, together wih the import and export values for manufactures.

Mr. Channon: The figures in the table are on the overseas trade statistics basis, with insurance and freight costs included in the imports but not the exports. Balance of payments figures, with imports and exports both valued exclusive of freight and insurance, are not available. Annualised data are unreliable as a guide to the outcome of the year.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the value of imports from and exports to Germany of finished manufactures each year since 1970 and in 1985 to date at an annual rate.

Mr. Channon: The figures in the table are on the overseas trade statistics basis, with insurance and freight costs included in the imports but not the exports. Balance of payments figures, with imports and exports both valued exclusive of freight and insurance, are not available. Annualised data are unreliable as a guide to the outcome for the year.

Overseas Contracts (Loans)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take steps to assist British manufacturers in major overseas contracts by offering loans to potential customers.

Mr. Channon: The Government recognise that some developing countries may prefer aid in the form of loans, rather than grants supplemented by export credits, to finance their major projects. The Government are therefore discussing with the financial community mechanisms to provide such loans under the aid and trade provision with the overseas aid programme.

WALES

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Wales what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The permanent staff in post in my Department numbered 2,185 full-time equivalents on 1 April 1984 and 2,278½ on 1 April 1985. This increase arose because of transfers of functions and staff from other Government departments, mainly the Department of Trade and Industry.

Planning Inquiry (Appeal)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to announce his decision following the inquiry held on 8 and 9 January at the Guildhall, Swansea, into the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, section 36 appeal; land adjacent to Pennard burial ground, Vennaway lane, Pennard and the Swansea (land off Vennaway lane, Pennard) compulsory purchase order 1982.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The decision was announced on 1 July 1985.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the names and locations of the woodlands for which felling licences for the conversion of the land to agriculture were issued in the Forestry Commission's north and south Wales conservancies, respectively, in the years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985, c. 225]: The information, which covers coniferous, broadleaved and mixed woods is as follows:

TRANSPORT

Malaysian Airlines System

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is preventing the implementation of the extra daily service by Malaysian Airlines System into London Heathrow.

Mr. Michael Spicer: British Airways and Malaysian Airlines System have now agreed that MAS should operate its fifth weekly frequency to London as from July 1986. I expect the other details affecting the implementation of the new service to be finalised during official consultations to be held in Kuala Lumpur at the end of July.

Driving Licences

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to extend the recognition of driving licences to further countries outside the European Community.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Representative organisations are being invited to give their views on a proposal that Austria and Japan should be added to the list of countries whose licences are exchangeable for British ordinary licences. The proposed order under the Road Traffic (Driving Licences) Act 1983 would come into effect on 1 November 1985.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Unemployed Persons

75. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if Her Majesty's Government will seek powers, in cases where an individual has been unemployed for six months or more, to give him an advance of another year's unemployed benefit for the purpose of a deposit on a house in another part of the United Kingdom on condition that he obtains a skilled job; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Unemployment benefit is a contingency benefit to provide for periods of loss of earnings because of unemployment. It is therefore paid periodically—usually fortnightly—on proof of continuing unemployment. It would be inappropriate, and would change the nature of the benefit, to make advance payments of the kind suggested. However, the Manpower Services Commission's employment transfer scheme gives financial assistance (subject to certain elegibility conditions) to unemployed people moving home to take up employment in another area. Under this scheme, advance payments may be made to help with the deposit or other direct costs of purchasing property.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will break down the number of claimants who will lose (a) up to 50p and (b) up to 100p a week for the housing benefit changes announced on 18 June; and if he will break down the data according to whether claimants are above or below retirement age.

Mr. Newton: I assume the hon. Member has in mind changes other than the normal uprating changes. Estimates of the numbers whose housing benefit will be up to 50p and up to £1 less than it would otherwise have been because of the proposed increase in the rate rebate taper above the needs allowance this November, offset by the real improvement in the dependent child addition to the needs allowance, are as follows:

Thousand, Great Britain

	Up to 50p	50p to £1
Above pension age	910	400
Below pension age	220	190
Total	1,130	590

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of standard housing benefit recipients with capital of over (a) £3,000 and (b) £6,000.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to the reply, 3 July 1985, c. 175]: At present capital is ignored for housing benefit purposes although income from capital is taken into account (whereas for Supplementary benefit, Capital is taken into account but investment income is ignored) and we do not collect specific information about amounts of capital held by households which receive housing benefit. However, the 1983 family expenditure survey included questions on income from capital. On this basis, which may not be very reliable, it is estimated that in 1983-84 about 750,000 standard housing benefit recipients had capital over £3,000, somewhat under half of whom had capital over £6,000.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations and information he has received about virus-related cancer of the cervix which spreads very quickly in young women and the survival chances of such women; whether he has any new proposals on the matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: For some years there has been growing speculation by experts in this field that virus-induced changes in the cervix may underline the development of many cases of cervical cancer. We are advised on the most appropriate pattern of cervical cancer screening by the committee on gynaecological cytology whose members are distinguished experts in the field and are fully aware of the latest scientific views about the aetiology of the disease. The advice of the committee on screening of women under 35 remains that any woman who is or has been sexually active should have a first cervical smear when she first presents for contraceptive advice and thereafter at ages 20, 25 and 30.

We will continue to follow closely scientific debate on the nature and incidence of the disease. Any policy on screening must of course reflect the fact that 94 per cent. of all deaths are of women aged over 35. However, some of our critics mistakenly suggest that our policies discourage screening of younger women which, as I have indicated, is not so.

Nurses (Pay Award)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the pay increase recently awarded for nurses has not yet been received by them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We published the new pay scales on 1 July. Implementation is a matter for health authorities, but I understand they hope to pay the new rates in August. The delay is caused by the need to complete the full computer programming required.

Health Visitors

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why health visitors have been downgraded from their previous pay level of sister 1/senior nurse grade 8; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 78 of the review body's second report on nursing staff, midwives and health visitors (Cmnd. 9529).

Health Service Commissioner (Report)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the annual report of the Health Service Commissioner for 1984-85.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Health Service Commissioner has, as in previous years, made a single report on the performance of his functions in England, Scotland and Wales. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Social Services, Scotland and Wales have presented the report to the House today. It will be published tomorrow and copies will be available from the Vote Office.

Wood Preservatives

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what health checks have been made on creosote and other wood preservatives to ensure that their level of toxicity is kept within safe limits; and if he will make it his policy that such substances should bear a health hazard warning.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

The sale of wood preservatives in the United Kingdom is controlled by formal agreement under the pesticides safety precautions scheme. Under this scheme, new active ingredients must be notified to the Health and Safety Executive and cleared by an independent panel of experts before they are put on sale. Containers must have a label giving precautions for use together with the appropriate hazard symbol. The Government are taking steps to introduce legislation to give statutory backing to these arrangements.

Nuclear Installations (Cancer)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list and describe the research projects commissioned to implement the recommendations number 1 to 4 of the report of the advisory group chaired by Sir Douglas Black on the possible increased incidence of cancer in west Cumbria, relating to nuclear installations at Sellafield; and if he will estimate the approximate cost and duration of each project.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 21 June 1985, c. 250-52]: I regret that the estimate of cost contained therein for the research commissioned to implement recommendation 1 of the Black report was inaccurate: instead of £41,600, this should have read £46,200.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of single claimants aged 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24 and 25 years, respectively, received (a) supplementary benefit as a non-householder in April and (b) supplementary benefit in their own right but share their home with people other than parents.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to the reply, 3 July, c. 177]: I regret that the information asked for in (b) is not available. The latest available information for (a) is for December 1983 and is as follows:

Percentage of single supplementary benefit claimants (without dependants) receiving non-householder scale rates.

Age	Percentage

19	86
20	78
21	73
22	70
23	65
24	64

NB The other categories are not just householders but include joint householders, boarders and claimants in hospital.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Black Economy

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of staff deployed by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to combat the black economy and evasion of value added tax; and whether he intends to allocate any additional staff to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise for this purpose.

Mr. Hayhoe: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has in the region of 4,000 officers engaged on VAT control duties, visiting both registered and unregistered businesses. In the year 1985-86 it is planned to provide, from savings elsewhere within the Department, an additional 146 officers for this work.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the weighted average exchange rate for the pound sterling against currencies other than the United States dollar each quarter since the beginning of 1979 and each month in the current year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is in the table.

Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect on international trade caused by sharp fluctuations in exchange rate movements.

Mr. Lawson: There is little empirical evidence that short-term volatility in exchange rates has any significant effect on the volume of international trade. Larger and more persistent movements, however, may lead to changes in the patterns of international trade which are unlikely to be sustainable, and to a dangerous build-up of protectionist pressures.

Interests Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the level of interest rates in the United Kingdom and Germany for each quarter since 1970 and at the current time.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. Figures for a range of UK interest rates are available from "Financial Statistics", table 13.15. Figures for a range of German interest rates are available in "International Financial Statistics". The relevant lines in the section dealing with Germany are 60, 60b, 60bs and 61.

EC (Finance)

Mr. William Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the total payments by the United Kingdom to European Economic Community funds from 1 January 1973 to 31 December 1984, showing the body to which the payments were made and including payments to the European Investment Bank and the European Coal and Steel Community, and also showing the total amounts the United Kingdom has received from these bodies in the same period in (a) loans and (b) grants;

(2) what sums have been paid by the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community in interest charges on sums on loan to the United Kingdom from the European Economic Community in each year or financial year since 1 January 1973 to the latest convenient date;

(3) what sums have been repaid of the capital sums lent to the United Kingdom by the European Economic Community in each year from 1 January 1973 to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. William Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what purposes the sums paid by the United Kingdom to the EEC in respect of capital repayments of EEC loans to the United Kingdom are used.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The European Investment Bank, the European Atomic Energy Authority and the European Coal and Steel Community lend money in the United Kingdom and other member states. The European Commission (with the help of the EIB) also lends money under the new Community instrument. Capital repayments are used to service the original loans raised to finance this lending. Additional information on the Community's borrowing and lending operations is contained in the report on the "Borrowing and Lending Activities of the Community in 1984" (Doc. No. 6992/85), a copy of which has been deposited in the House.

Mr. William Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the total sums accumulated by the EEC from member states from 1 January 1973 to the latest convenient date which are either (a) on loan and (b) held by the EEC; and, of these sums, how much represents the capital payments from each state and how much interest charges paid on loans made in respect of loans.

Mr. Ian Stewart: At 31 December 1984, total borrowing outstanding of the European Communities was as follows: European Coal and Steel Community 7119 mecus; European Investment Bank 25007 mecus; European Atomic Energy Authority 1892 mecus; New Community Instrument 4432 mecus; EEC borrowing for balance of payments purposes 4932 mecus. Not all this borrowing was raised in member states. The bulk of the borrowing has been used for on-lending in the European Community. As at 31 December 1984, capital payments to the EIB by member states have totalled 1061 mecus. I regret the other information requested is not readily available.

Cost of Living Index

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will establish a separate cost of living index reflecting the spending patterns of retirement pensioners for the purposes of assessing future adjustments in the retirment pension; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985, c. 357]: Pensioner price indices are published in the Employment Gazette on a quarterly basis; they are specifically designed to show the impact of price changes on the expenditure of low-income pensioner households. These indices have tended to move broadly in line with the retail prices index, which is used for the annual uprating of retirement pensions.

EC Rebates

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many member states of the European Economic Community have now paid to the European Economic Community the sums which they were committed to pay in terms of the undertaking of the Council on 23 April designed to enable the United Kingdom's 1985 rebate to be paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985, c. 357]: The 1985 budget contains provision for the United Kingdom's 1000 mecu abatement to be paid when the own resources decision has been ratified. The Commission has yet to request payment under the 1985 IGA.

DEFENCE

Jaguar and Tornado Projects

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the national share in the Jaguar and Tornado projects, respectively.

Mr. Butler: The United Kingdom shares of the Jaguar and Tornado projects are 50 and 48 per cent. respectively.

Royal Observer Corps

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current strength of the Royal Observer Corps and the numbers currently allocated.

Mr. Lee: At the end of May 1985 the strength of the Royal Observer Corps was 10,513, against an establishment of 12,333.

Adair House

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the Defence Land Agent has refused a request for a temporary lease of Adair house, Shooters Hill road, London SE18, for an experimental riding centre from the London borough of Greenwich.

Mr. Lee: A temporary lease would not be appropriate, since we expect to dispose of Adair house in the near future.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence when Adair house, Shooters Hill road, London SE18, ceased to be used as a nurses' home for the Royal Herbert hospital; how long it has been vacant; and at what cost.

Mr. Lee: Adair house ceased to be a nurses home for the Royal Herbert hospital in 1979. It was then occupied as offices until 1982, since when it has been in partial use as an accommodation store for the military hospital. The cost has been about £26,000 since 1982.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals for the future use of Adair house, Shooters Hill road, SE18, are currently under consideration; and when a decision is expected.

Mr. Lee: Adair house has been declared surplus to requirements by the Army. Subject to there being no other MOD need, it will be passed to PSA for disposal in the normal way.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

UNESCO

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will propose to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, in conjunction with other member states, that it should initiate the appointment of management consultants to recommend changes in the structure and efficiency of the organisation, on the basis of his letter to the Director-General of the organisation of 5 December 1984.

Mr. Raison: In my letter to the Director-General of 2 April 1984 I urged that UNESCO should draw on outside advice in such key areas of management as decentralization, decision making and personnel management. Subsequently the temporary committee of the executive board recommended that UNESCO should continue to use outside expertise particularly where this might lead to improvements in its functioning.

SCOTLAND

Horticulture

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the relevant redundancy, pension and other costs of discontinuing entirely the specialist advisory services to the horticulture industry in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: As a result of the integration of specialist and general advisory staff in the agricultural research and development, advisory and educational fields within the Scottish agricultural colleges, and the close integration of these areas of work with individual members of staff covering more than one area of activity, it is not possible to estimate the cost of discontinuing the specialist advisory service to the horticultural industry in Scotland.

In the event that this specialist advisory service were to be discontinued the associated redundancy, pension and other costs would be affected by a number of factors (e.g.

re-deployment of staff). It is impossible to speculate on such matters and I regret that for these reasons it is not possible to provide the information requested.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will estimate the cost of maintaining a specialist advisory service to the horticulture industry in Scotland for plant pathology, soil testing and other normal advisory service functions;

(2) if he will estimate the annual cost of the present advisory service for horticulture in Scotland, the number of staff employed, and the total annual cost of their salaries, expenses and other overheads.

Mr. John MacKay: Given the integration of agricultural research and development the advisory services and education in the three Scottish agricultural colleges, with individual members of staff covering more than one area of activity, it is not possible to provide precise details in the way requested. The estimated cost of maintaining the advisory service to the horticultural industry in Scotland is £0·5 million per annum.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate, at the latest convenient date, the acreage under horticultural crops in Scotland, the total number of people employed on a full-time or part-time basis and the number and size of horticultural units analysed in convenient categories.

Mr. John MacKay: As at June 1984, the total area of horticultural crops in Scotland was 11,417 hectares. Although 1,962 farms grew one or more horticultural crops, only 104 farms were classified as full-time horticultural holdings, with a total area of 1,211 hectares. Detailed information is available only for these farms. In terms of size, 61 were classified as small, 32 as medium sized and 11 as large farms. A total of 649 people were employed on the 104 farms. There were 437 full-time, 80 part-time, and 132 casual employees.

Job Creation

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what research he has undertaken to determine the number of extra jobs provided in Scotland as a result of the change in the licensing laws.

Mr. Ancram: While there is reason to suppose that the more relaxed regime introduced by the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 has led to an increase in employment possibilities, no formal research has been undertaken into this aspect of the change in licensing laws.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the post titles and grades of the specialist staff within the Forestry Commission who will be providing specialised training on wildlife and landscape conservation in broadleaved woodlands for the commission's private woodland foresters in 1985-86 and 1986-87 as part of the training measures proposed in the broadleaves in Britain review.

Mr. John MacKay: Such training as is needed will be carried out by the Forestry Commission's professional training staff assisted, as appropriate, by wildlife and landscape conservation experts both from within the commission and from other statutory bodies. It is not possible at this stage to provide a list of the staff who will be involved.

Birds (Licensed Killing)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the numbers of (a) goosanders, (b) red-breasted margansers and (c) cormorants killed under licence in the last year for which complete figures are available and express this number as a percentage of the Scottish population of each species, giving the date when the population estimate was made.

Mr. John Mackay: The last year for which complete figures are available is 1984, when numbers of birds killed in Scotland under licence were reported as follows:

	Killed
(a) Goosanders	514
(b) Red-breasted mergansers	516
(c) Cormorants	886

There are no population estimates providing reliable figures for these species more recent than those arising from surveys conducted in the period 1969-1977. Information for this period supplied by the Nature Conservancy Council is as follows:

(a) Goosanders:
Estimated pairs 736/952 (Scotland) — 1977 (Meek and Little)

(b) Red-breasted mergansers:
Estimated pairs 1-2,000 (Britain)—1970 (Atkinson-Wills)
Estimated pairs 2-3,000 (Britain and Ireland) — 1976 (Sharrock)

(c) Cormorants
Estimated breeding pairs 3,671 (Scotland) — 1969-70 (NCC)

The most recent of these surveys, that in 1977 of goosanders indicated that the species was expanding its range and that a number of local estimates of population were conservative.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what manpower reductions has Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Mr. Younger: Between 1 April 1984 and 1 April 1985, the number of staff in the Scottish Office increased by 1·4 per cent. from 9,774 to 9,911½. This increase is attributable to the Scottish Prison Service, the staff of which increased from 2,738½ to 2,880½. The number of staff employed in the rest of the Scottish Office fell slightly, from 7,035½ to 7,031; that reduction was achieved in spite of the addition of 96 posts in connection with the transfer of work on regional development grants from the Department of Trade and Industry.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of total expenditure by Scottish local authorities under section 83 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 in each of the last five years.

Mr. Ancram: Details of expenditure incurred by authorities under section 83 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 have only been collected centrally since 1982-83. The figures for total expenditure for 1982-83 and 1983-84 are given in the table. Information for 1984-85 is not yet available.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average basic salary excluding allowances and overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The following table shows the average level of basic pay in each grade in 1984-85:

Salaries
Governor I	22,605
Governor II	18,333
Governor III	15,660
Governor IV	12,684
Assistant Governor	10,982
Chief Officer I	11,984
Chief Officer II/Chief Clerk Officer	11,096
Wages
Principal Officer/Principal Clerk Officer	175·06
Senior Officer	156·29
Prison Officer/Clerk Officer	135·81

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average gross salary including allowances and overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The information is set out in the following tables:

1. Average level of gross pay including rent allowance in lieu of quarters and tax compensation on rent allowance:

Salaries 1984-85
Governor I	25,600
Governor II	21,328
Governor III	18,595
Governor IV	14,901
Assistant Governor	13,199

2. Average level of gross pay including overtime, housing allowance in lieu of quarters and tax compensation on housing allowance:

(a) Salaries 1984-85:
Chief Officer I	15,677
Chief Officer II/Chief Clerk Officer	14,770
(b) Wages 1984-85:
Principal/Principal Clerk Officer	276
Senior Officer	251
Prison Officer/Clerk Officer	222

These figures take into account that some officers live in official quarters; but do not include allowances payable at various rates for special skills, responsibilities etc., variable allowances or substitution payments.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The average overtime worked in 1984-85 was around 428 hours—or 8·2 hours a week by each officer. Governors are not overtime grade.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of officers had a gross salary in excess of (a) £13,000, (b) £14,000 and (c) £15,000 for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not available in the form requested and could not be produced without disproportionate cost.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures for the number of part-time employees in Scotland by sex and sector in each of the last five years.

Mr. Younger [pursuant to his reply, 4 July 1985, c. 251]: Estimates of the number of female part-time employees in employment in Scotland in each of the major sectors of such employment for each of the last five years are set out in the table; the estimates for 1982, 1983 and 1984 are provisional. Estimates for part-time male employment are available only for 1981.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Service

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total strength by grades including governors at 31 March of the Prison Service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

	Number
Governors	29
Assistant Governors	9
Assistant Governors (Trainees)	11
Chief Officers	26
Principal Officers	124
Senior Officers	184
Basic Grade Officers	2,404

Health Education

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to make health education and promotion a higher priority in future regional strategic health plans.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department of Health and Social Services for Northern Ireland will shortly be issuing guidelines for the next round of strategic planning covering the period 1987-92. Both the guidelines and the subsequent regional strategic plan will give a high priority to the development of health education and prevention services.

Public Health

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why the Chief Medical Officer for Northern Ireland has discontinued the publication of an annual report on the state of public health in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Chief Medical Officer for Northern Ireland does not publish a report on the state of public health in Northern Ireland. The annual report of the Department of Health and Social Services contains such information and a further report covering the period 1 January 1980 to 31 December 1982 is due to be published later this year.

Community Physicians

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the ratio of community physicians per 1,000 of population in each of the Northern Ireland health board areas; and how these figures compare with provision in Scotland, England and Wales.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information in respect of each of the four health and social services boards is as follows:

	Ratio per 1,000 of the population
Eastern	·0077
Northern	·0104
Southern	·0105
Western	·0077

The ratio in England and Wales is ·0063 and in Scotland ·027.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why senior registrars in community medicine from Northern Ireland have to seek higher specialty training in England.

Mr. Chris Patten: Higher specialty training in community medicine for senior registrars is in fact available in Northern Ireland and there are at present six approved senior registrar posts.

Housing Executive (Heating Rebates)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how much money is owed by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to tenants as rebates on their district heating payments for the last financial year;

(2) to how many people district heating rebates are currently due; and what are the average levels of such rebates.

Mr. Chris Patten: These are matters for the Housing Executive but I understand from the chairman that some £906,000 is due to 4,469 tenants, representing an average rebate of £203. About one third of the total amount due will, however, be credited to tenants' district heating accounts to offset existing arrears of payments due to the Executive.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what further measures are being taken to seek to expedite the payment of district heating rebates to Northern Ireland Housing Executive tenants.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Housing Executive but I understand from the chairman that procedural and systems improvements made by the Executive and its district heating metering agents should enable earlier payment of district heating rebates in 1985.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when district heating rebates due from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive were paid in 1982, 1983 and 1984; and when will they be paid in the current year.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Housing Executive but I understand from the chairman that for the years in question the periods over which rebates were paid were as follows:

Year Ending	Period of Payment
31 March 1982	August-December 1982
31 March 1983	August-December 1983
31 March 1984	August-September 1984
31 March 1985	To be paid during July-August 1985

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Diplomats (Illegal Parking)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a copy of the letter of 19 April from the vice marshal of the Diplomatic Corps to all heads of mission in the United Kingdom about illegal parking in London.

Mr. Renton: The text of the letter and of its second enclosure are as follows:

19 April 1985

Illegal Parking

I must once again draw your attention to the problem of the parking of diplomatic vehicles in London. The number of unpaid fixed penalty notices for parking offences by diplomatic vehicles is now running at the enormous figure of over 100,000 a year. This is double the figure of only 5 years ago and represents a much higher proportion of the total number of such offences.

I enclose a copy of a Parliamentary Answer given on 13 February by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office, which gives details of the total number of fixed parking penalty notices cancelled on grounds of diplomatic immunity for the three-year period 1981-1983 (which is the latest period for which complete figures were then available) broken down by country and organisation. The 1984 figures, which are still subject to late payments and cancellations, are also enclosed. These figures include both official and private vehicles. The successful efforts made by certain Missions to keep their figures down are appreciated. The very high figures for certain other Missions have also been noted.

This is a matter of growing public concern. Illegally parked vehicles not only cause inconvenience to residents in the areas affected but also contribute to traffic congestion, disrupt access, cause delays in public transport, hinder emergency services and generally prevent others from conducting their lawful official and private business. Moreover they bring discredit on the diplomatic community as a whole.

In my circular of 1 June 1983 I noted that "several Heads of Mission have told me that their staff (like those of UK Missions abroad) are under instructions to pay their parking penalties except where they have been unavoidably incurred on essential official duty—not simply on daily travel to and from work". It is clear however from the statistics either that many Missions do not have such instructions or alternatively that compliance with them is far from being fully effective.

As you will be aware, diplomats are obliged under Article 41 of the Vienna Convention to respect the laws and regulations of the receiving state. Deliberate and persistent disregard of this obligation cannot be ignored or regarded as acceptable behaviour by those concerned. In his letter of 15 August 1984 the Permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office drew attention to the Secretary of State's statement to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Commons on 18 July that we would henceforth expect and apply more stringent standards.

The Government of course recognise that certain individual Missions, because of their geographical location, face particular difficulties. In this connection I should like to remind you that the Local Authorities have agreed to allocate up to three marked parking bays ("St. Andrew's Crosses") to each diplomatic Mission plus one for each Head of Mission, subject to local traffic conditions.

In my letter of 12 December 1983 I informed you that cars bearing diplomatic registration plates would be exempted from wheel-clamping. This remains the position but the exemption of the diplomatic corps has, as you will be aware, continued to arouse criticism from the press and Londoners generally. This is all the more reason for impressing upon your staff the importance of scrupulous adherence to parking regulations. In cases where diplomatic vehicles cause obstruction or danger, they will continue to be towed away. We expect the towing charge to be paid on the basis that it is a legal obligation in respect of a service performed.

As from 1 May 1985 detailed records will be kept of unpaid parking tickets by all cars with diplomatic registration plates. Persistent and deliberate failure by individual diplomats in their private cars to respect parking regulations and to pay fixed penalty notices will henceforth call into question their continued acceptability as members of diplomatic Missions in London. Where necessary particular cases will be drawn to our personal attention with a warning about the possible consequences. Due account will be taken if the parking tickets are subsequently paid or appropriate contributions made to the Central Ticket Office. Further unpaid parking tickets incurred by individuals will lead to a request for the withdrawal of the offender. An alternative in certain cases could be to grant a waiver of immunity so that the person concerned can be prosecuted.

Note will also be made of the total number of fixed penalty notices incurred by individual official cars of diplomatic Missions and left unpaid. In particular cases these will be drawn to your personal attention with a request, in the first instance, for appropriate action. If this has no effect, we shall be obliged to take further measures. This could include exercising the right under Article 9 of the Vienna Convention to declare a chauffeur unacceptable.

I trust that I will be able to count on your full cooperation and that it will not be necessary for me to draw individual cases to your attention. I must however leave you in no doubt about the strength of public feeling on this question and of the Government's determination to reduce very substantially the present level of illegal parking by individual vehicles.

Signed E H B Gibbs
Vice Marshall of the Diplomatic Corps

European Cup Final, Brussels

Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to ensure that all British football fans arrested in Brussels before, during and after the Liverpool v. Juventus match in Brussels are properly represented; and if he will request the Belgian Government to send such arrested fans to Britain to stand trial.

Mr. Renton: The five football fans awaiting trial in Brussels were all arrested before the match. They will be legally represented. One has engaged a lawyer privately and the court has already assigned lawyers to the others. Since the offences with which they are charged (theft or violent behaviour) occurred in Belgium and are not ones over which English courts have extraterritorial jurisdiction, the accused will have to stand trial in Belgium.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what manpower reductions his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: No manpower reductions could be achieved during 1984-85 in the Crown Office, Procurator Fiscal Service and Lord Advocate's Department. Despite an increase of 25 in overall numbers, these Departments remained below their approved complementing levels throughout the period.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether jobcentres have any record of the names and addresses of the long-term unemployed in their locality.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Since the introduction of voluntary registration in October 1982 jobcentres no longer retain a complete record of the unemployed people seeking work in their locality. Such a comprehensive register has not proved necessary to the prompt filling of the great majority of vacancies notified to the employment service.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment when the research being carried out into the 18 to 25 years age group long-term unemployed and the information being collected will be published.

Mr. Alan Clark: The programme of research into long-term unemployment among 18 to 24-year-olds will not be completed until spring 1986. It is expected that the results of the research will be published soon after the work is completed.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment how often and in what circumstances it is necessary for an unemployed person to visit an unemployment benefit office.

Mr. Alan Clark: Most unemployed people attend their local unemployment benefit office to make their first benefit claim in their spell of unemployment. Thereafter they attend once each fortnight to sign a declaration that they are, amongst other things, unemployed and available for work. Some unemployed people sign weekly because they have asked to be paid weekly. Claimants aged 50 or more who have been unemployed for a year attend to sign on once a quarter.

However, people living six miles or more from their nearest unemployment benefit office can sign their weekly or fortnightly declaration at home and send it in by post but they are also interviewed in person periodically. Those living 10 miles or more away from their nearest unemployment benefit office can additionally make their first claim by post.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of registered unemployed currently register for unemployment benefit by post.

Mr. Alan Clark: During the year ended June 1985 an average of 5·6 per cent. of unemployed people made their regular weekly or fortnightly declaration of unemployment by post. Additionally some people living 10 miles or more from their nearest unemployment benefit office made their initial claims by post. No statistics are kept of how many people so claimed.

Job Release Scheme

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing for each year since the inception of the job release scheme the yearly increments under the scheme, the changes in tax allowance under the scheme, the change in average adult earnings, the change in the level of the retirement pension and the rate of inflation.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is as follows:

	Weekly increase in untaxed job release allowance		Gross weekly increase in taxable job release allowance
	Higher rate £	Lower rate £	Higher rate £	Lower rate £
Month when job release allowance was increased

Notes:

1. Job Release Scheme became operational on 1 January 1977.
2. A higher rate of allowance for an applicant's whose spouse's income was less than £11 per week was introduced in July 1978.

3. A taxable allowance for those on the Scheme for more than twelve months was introduced in April 1980. The allowance was set so that, on average, those on the taxable scheme received no less after tax than those on the untaxed scheme.

National Institute of Fresh Produce

Sir John Wells asked the Secretary of State for Employment in which towns or other centres the National Institute of Fresh Produce has organised courses supported by his Department since the inception of the institute.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Since 1982, when it assumed responsibility for training in the fresh produce industry, the National Institute of Fresh Produce has organised courses supported by the Manpower Services Commission at the following places: Birmingham, Bradford, Bristol, Cardiff, Chichester, Gateshead, Glasgow, Leeds, Leicester, Liverpool, London, Manchester, Newcastle, Southall, Southampton, Uxbridge and in several towns in East Anglia.

Sir John Wells asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people have attended training courses organised by the National Institute of Fresh Produce supported by his Department in the past full year for which figures are available; and how many he anticipates will take part in such courses in the current year.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I regret that information is not held in the precise form requested. In 1984, 412 trainees, of all age groups, attended training courses run by the National Institute of Fresh Produce to which the Manpower Services Commission had contributed financially.

In the first quarter of 1985, 244 trainees attended institute courses which were supported by the commission. It is anticipated that this upward trend will continue throughout the remainder of 1985.

Wages Councils

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations about the future of wages councils were made to his Department by the Co-operative Employers' Association at the meeting on 3 July; what response he is making; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The many different opinions in response to the consultative paper on wages councils will be fully considered before final decisions are taken. It is for those who responded to decide whether they publish their responses.

Job Creation

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the figures for the numbers of additional jobs created since March 1983 include second jobs of either employees or self-employed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department's employment estimates include second jobs when those jobs are held as employees but not when they are held as self-employed.

Pneumoconiosis

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases have been approved for compensation payments during the past 12 months under the Pneumoconiosis etc. (Workers Compensation) Act 1979; what has been the average payment made in these cases; what is the total number of cases for which payment has been made since the enactment of this legislation; and what is the total compensation paid over this period and the average compensation corresponding to these figures.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is as follows:

	Approved applications	Total paid £	Average payment £
1 July 1984 to 30 June 1985	46	269,519	5,859
4 July 1979 to 30 June 1985	4,488	27,037,524	6,024

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the effectiveness of the youth training scheme is being measured on a national basis.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985]: The Manpower Services Commission is carrying out a number of studies concerned with the effectiveness of the youth training scheme. These include a regular monthly survey of young people after they leave the youth training scheme; a cohort study comparing the experiences of youth training scheme participants and those entering the labour market by other routes; a study of the wider labour market effects of the scheme; and a survey of organisations providing training under the scheme.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment, what are the current arrangements for monitoring the provision by employers of post youth training scheme training and the match of this training to skill requirements.

Mr. Peter Morrison: [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985]: The Manpower Services Commission is carrying out three studies in this area: a regular monthly survey of young people after they leave the youth training scheme, which shows the occupational areas in which leavers are obtaining work and the type of training they receive in these jobs; a cohort study, which compares the experiences of scheme trainees with that of young people who enter the labour market by other routes; and a further study which is examining the effects of the youth training scheme on local markets. However, employers continue to be primarily responsible for assessing their skill requirements and training their staff accordingly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the effectiveness of the non-statutory training organisations which replaced some industry training boards in predicting, measuring and meeting their industry's needs, is being measured.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985]: Consideration of the effectiveness with which non-statutory training organisations carry out their functions is primarily a matter for the particular industrial sector. The Manpower Services Commission recently received reports from the CBI and its own officials which indicated that the arrangements for non-statutory training organisations are generally working satisfactorily.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Gangmasters

Miss Maynard asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many complaints, and of what nature, he has received about gangmasters since 1 January 1982.

Mrs. Fenner: I informed the hon. Member on 14 July 1983 that nine complaints about gangmasters had been received, eight alleging payment of piece rates below Agricultural Wages Board minimum rates and one relating to holiday remuneration. Since then no further complaints of this nature have been received.

Horticulture

Sir John Wells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department makes any direct financial contribution to horticultural training; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department makes a substantial annual grant to the Agricultural Training Board which is responsible for providing horticultural as well as agricultural training.

Sir John Wells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to provide financial or other support for the Institute of Horticulture; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: We welcome the establishment of the Institute of Horticulture to foster the interests of qualified horticulturalists, but we have no plans to provide it with financial support.

Milk Quota

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make it his policy to seek to buy in enough milk quota to honour supplementary quota without any percentage discount.

Mr. MacGregor: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Tendering Policy)

11. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to introduce measures to stop local authorities discriminating against companies' tenders on political grounds.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Soon.

Rate Support Grant

14. Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to announce provisional details of the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I hope to do so before the summer recess.

46. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has with organisations representing regional interests prior to determining the rate support grant settlement for local authorities in the north and north-west regions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend consults the local authorities through the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance, and the various groups of central Government officials and local government officers which report to it. Local authorities in the north and north-west regions are represented at CCLGF and on the officer groups by the Association of County Councils, the Association of District Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

51. Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much rate support grant has been paid to Lambeth borough council in the current financial year.

Mr. Waldegrave: £17·19 million has been paid so far in 1985-86.

Local Government Reform

15. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, in the light of changes to the Local Government Bill and the availability of further information since the financial and explanatory memorandum was published, he has revised or updated the estimates in that memorandum of the savings likely to be made following the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No.

20. Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the present position in the discussions between the Staff Commission and the unions in the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: These are essentially matters for the Staff Commission itself. But the chairman has told me that some discussions of this kind have taken place. He has also emphasised that the commission remains very willing to meet representatives of any union whose members are effected by the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils.

24. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his most recent estimates of potential savings following the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Those set out in the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Local Government Bill, as amplified by the answer I gave on 30 November in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracy).

Rating

16. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations have been made on the review of the rating system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: A large proportion of the letters my Department receives make suggestions about the review of the local government finance system. We hope to announce our conclusions around the turn of the year.

Derelict Land

17. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action his Department is taking to enable derelict land of less than one acre to be put on the register of derelict land.

Mr. Macfarlane: Land does not have to be derelict before it can be entered on the land registers. At present, public bodies are required to register unused and underused sites of one acre or more in their ownership. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is, however, empowered to register underused publicly owned land whatever its size. On 7 June he announced that he is prepared to consider registering sites below one acre when they are brought to his attention by the private sector. We are not asking public bodies to register all the sites they own.

Birmingham (Parish Councils)

18. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he intends to take over Birmingham city council's plans to create 90 parish councils and their implications for rate capping.

Mr. Waldegrave: Neither the Birmingham city council, nor the Local Government Boundary Commission which is conducting a review in the city, has power to create parishes. If the Commission evntually reports to me with proposals, I will consider whether or not to accept them. There are no immediate implications for rate capping.

Private Rented Sector

19. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the private rented sector.

58. Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring forward legislation to facilitate the provision of increased letting of private properties.

Mr. Gow: The Government hope to introduce legislation to encourage the supply of more homes for renting in the private sector, but probably not during the lifetime of this Parliament.

35. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the control of new private sector lettings.

Mr. Gow: We continue to receive many representations on this subject.

73. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of householders live in privately rented dwellings.

Sir George Young: The 1983 general household survey shows 11 per cent. of households in England living in privately rented accommodation, including 2 per cent. in Housing Association accommodation.

Improvement Grant System

21. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the impact on charitable building trusts of his proposals for the improvement grant system.

Sir George Young: The Green Paper "Home Improvement—A New Approach" sets out proposals for the broad framework of a new home improvement grant and loan system. We would welcome comments, including any on the impact on charitable building trusts.

Urban Aid Programme

22. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Bradford about the allocation of revenue expenditure to voluntary organisations under the urban aid programme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received representations from a number of organisations in addition to those mentioned in reply to the hon. Member on 13 June. I now await revised proposals from the city council.

32. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had on the level of urban programme finance for new and continuing projects.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has received many representations in support of the urban programme. These incorporate a variety of views on how resources should be divided between new and continuing schemes.

Local Government Finance

23. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has met representatives of the Association of County Councils since 3 May to discuss matters of local government finance.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Ministers met the leaders of the local authority associations on 20 May to discuss a report on the review of the capital control system. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State met the ACC on 10 June to consider the reform of local government finance.

Millwall Football Club

25. Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Millwall football club regarding planning permission for a superstore on its site.

Mr. Macfarlane: I know of no such representations. An appeal relating to proposals for a superstore on this site is, however, before my right hon. Friend.

Sports Council (Funding)

26. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to allocate extra funds to the Sports Council for the improvement of sports stadiums.

Mr. Macfarlane: The financial implications of safety improvement work are being considered by my working group, comprising representatives from the football authorities, the Football Trust, the Football Grounds Improvement Trust, the Sports Council and Government Departments. At this stage we do not have an overall estimate of the likely costs of any necessary safety work and it is therefore too early to consider how much, and from what source, funding might be available.

Liverpool

27. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next plans to visit Liverpool.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I plan to visit Merseyside later this month, but the programme has not yet been fixed.

Sports Grounds (Safety)

28. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the national associations of sports other than football in regard to ground safety.

Mr. Macfarlane: I met representatives of the Rugby League on 4 June and representatives of the Test and County Cricket Board on 21 June. Our discussions covered crowd control and behaviour and ground safety.

Ancient Monuments

29. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to introduce further legislation regarding the safety, security and welfare of ancient monuments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: No. My powers, and those of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission and, where necessary, of police authorities are generally adequate.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

30. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is now satisfied with the working of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government are satisfied that the 1981 Act provides a sound basis for future conservation policies, particularly following the passage of the recent amendment Act.

Gleneagles Agreement

31. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the operation in the United Kingdom of the Gleneagles agreement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government fully implement the requirements of the Commonwealth statement on apartheid in sport.

Rates Act (Local Authority Designation)

33. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is able to announce the date for giving details of authorities to be designated in 1986-87 under the Rates Act.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend hopes to announce the designated authorities before the summer recess.

Local Authority Housing

34. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authority houses he expects to be started in 1985-86.

Mr. Gow: Total housing starts for England in 1984 were 169,000, of which 23,000 were started by local authorities and new towns. The equivalent figures for the first five months of this calendar year were 69,000 and 8,000. It is not our practice to make forecasts.

38. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how many local authority dwellings built since 1950 are in need of demolition.

Sir George Young: This information is not currently available. However, we have recently asked all local authorities to provide information on the condition of their housing stock, including the number of dwellings they consider need to be demolished. Local authorities' returns are now being analysed and the results will be available in due course.

Environmental Hazards

36. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied that potential environmental hazards, including those of nuclear pollution, are being satisfactorily monitored and publicised.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. A number of Government Departments are involved in monitoring environmental quality, as are water authorities and local authorities. Numerous firms monitor around their own works, and many research programmes carried out by universities and Government laboratories also provide monitoring information.

My Department publishes the annual "Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics" which comments on the trends revealed by major environmental monitoring schemes, including those covering air pollution, water pollution and radioactivity. This publication also describes the major monitoring schemes in place.

Commonwealth Games 1986

37. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Minister with responsibilities for sport last met officials of the Commonwealth Games Federation to discuss the 1986 Commonwealth Games.

Mr. Macfarlane: I last met the chairman of the Commonwealth Games Federation for a general discussion about the games, including the 1986 games, on 7 September 1984. My officials keep in regular contact with the secretary of the Federation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has close and regular contact with the 1986 games organising committee.

Liverpool (Rate Support Grant)

39. Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much rate support grant has been paid to Liverpool city council in the current financial year.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: £36·48 million has been paid so far in 1985-86.

Northern Region (Housing)

40. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses in the northern region are unoccupied.

Mr. Gow: Local authorities' 1984 housing investment programme returns showed 10,604 empty local authority dwellings in the northern region at 1 April 1984.

Hazardous Waste

41. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce changes to the laws and regulations affecting the disposal of hazardous waste, in line with the report of the hazardous waste inspectorate.

Mr. Waldegrave: The main conclusion of this report is the need for all concerned to apply current standards and controls properly. My right hon. Friend and I intend shortly to discuss with both representatives of industry and the local authority associations what action is needed. I am currently considering, in the light of a review of the Control of Pollution (Special Wastes) Regulations, whether any measures are needed to strengthen the law in this field.

55. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his policy regarding the public disclosure of the results of the monitoring of hazardous waste disposal plants.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government accept the view of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution that there should be a presumption in favour of allowing access to information obtained by pollution authorities as part of their duties. An interdepartmental working party has been set up to consider the further measures needed to implement this general approach on a consistent and practicable basis.

69. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration is currently being given by his Department to increasing the powers of his Department or of local authorities to prevent the dumping or storage of asbestos, toxic or other wastes on derelict sites, particularly those previously with an industrial use.

Mr. Waldegrave: The disposal of such wastes is already subject to licensing control under the Control of Pollution Act 1974. In addition, movement of specified types of hazardous wastes are subject to the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980. My right hon. Friend is currently considering in the light of a review of these regulations whether these controls need to be strengthened or supplemented in any way.

Council House Sales

42. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total of capital receipts from the sale of council houses in 1984-85.

Mr. Gow: In 1984-85 English local authorities and new towns received an estimated £1·3 billion through initial payments and mortgage repayments relating to council house sales.

60. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in England since May 1979.

Sir George Young: From April 1979 to March 1985 about 626,000 dwellings were sold to sitting tenants by local authorities and new towns in England.

Shorthold Tenancies

43. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is planning any changes to the rules governing shorthold tenancies.

Sir George Young: We shall consider the future of shorthold in the context of the legislation to stimulate the supply of more private rented accommodation which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned in his reply to a question from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 12 June.

Home Improvement Finance

44. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with local authorities, building societies and other financial institutions on the wider provision of finance for home improvement.

Sir George Young: A preliminary discussion of the Green Paper "Home Improvement—A new Approach" took place on 10 June between representatives of the local authority associations and Ministers at the meeting of the Housing Consultative Council. My Department intends to discuss the Green Paper with a wide range of interested bodies, including the financial institutions.

Beaches (Health Standards)

45. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those beaches in Great Britain that do not meet the health standards laid down by the European Economic Community.

Mr. Waldegrave: Routine information only is held centrally on the quality of the bathing waters identified under the European Council directive of 8 December 1975. Of these waters, the following did not meet the directive's bacteriological standards in 1984:

Thorpe Bay (Essex); Ryde, Sandown Esplanade and Shanklin Chine (Isle of Wight); Goodrington (Paignton); and Porthminister (St. Ives).

Cricket Matches (Crowd Control)

47. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent discussions have taken place between the Minister with responsibility for sport and the Test and County Cricket Board concerning the implications for crowd control of spectator intrusion on to the playing area of cricket pitches; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I met representatives of the Test and County Cricket Board on 21 June. We discussed crowd control and crowd behaviour at recent cricket matches, including spectator intrusions on to the playing area. The TCCB shares my concern to ensure that early action is taken to stop the worrying decline in crowd behaviour and is urgently considering steps to be taken.

Heritage Policy

48. Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards Britain's heritage.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government's policy is to protect and promote the heritage for the present and future enjoyment of the British public and for the benefit of our tourist industries. We are therefore maintaining the royal parks and palaces to a high standard and shall continue to protect structures of archaelogical, architectural or historic importance through the powers and resources given to the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission and other agencies concerned with the built heritage and works of art. In addition, we shall ensure that the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission are given the necessary powers and resources to conserve the habitats of our plants and animals and the most important features of Britain's natural landscape.

Job Creation (Leicester)

49. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been committed by his Department to projects within the city of Leicester in 1985 and to date; and if he will estimate the number of jobs this created.

Sir George Young: since 1979-80 Leicester has received capital expenditure allocations of some £128 million for housing and £34 million for its inner area programme. Allocations for 1985-86 were £15 million and £5·43 million, respectively. In addition, Leicester has received grant towards expenditure of £65,081 on reclamation of derelict land over the period, none of it in 1985-86. Over the same period, the Housing Corporation, which is funded by my Department, has made allocations of £39 million for schemes in Leicester including £7·1 million in the current year. My right hon. Friend cannot say how many jobs have been created by these allocations.

Housing (Disabled People)

50. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had on the availability of housing for young disabled people.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has not received any such representations recently. But if the hon. Member would like to send me details of what he has in mind, I will look into the matter further.

Improvement Grants

52. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish his proposals for income scales for those who will be eligible for assistance under his Green Paper proposals about improvement grants.

Sir George Young: The Green Paper explains that our intention is to make the eligibility tests compatible with, even if they cannot be exactly the same as, those for entitlement to housing benefit. The overriding aim, however, will be to ensure that as far as possible the system includes those who are unable to afford necessary improvement and repair work unaided, and excludes those who do not need help. We shall publish our detailed proposals in due course, in the light of responses to the Green Paper.

Surplus Urban Land

53. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times he has used the powers given to him under section 98 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act to direct local authorities to sell surplus urban land.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer to my answer to my hon. Friend on 16 May 1985.

On 25 June my right hon. Friend gave notice, under section 99 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, to the owners of 50 sites on the land registers of his intention to exercise his powers under section 98 of the Act to require them to dispose of their interest in the land. The notices gave the owners of the sites 42 days in which to make representations as to why he should not issue the directions. A list of the 50 sites in question has been placed in the Library of the House.

Football Grounds (Ministerial Visits)

54. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many third and fourth division football grounds the Minister with responsibility for sport visited in his official capacity and on how many of these occasions he watched a match, during the last football season.

Mr. Macfarlane: I visited Bradford City's ground on 12 May 1985, the day after the tragic fire. I did not attend a third or fourth division match last season.

Business Rates

56. Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes any further studies on the effect of business rates on the location of employment.

Mr. Waldegrave: A number of organisations have offered further information on the effect of business rates in response to my letter of 8 March. A decision on further studies will be taken when the fresh information has been assessed.

South-East Structure Plans

57. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on structure plans in the south-east.

Mr. Macfarlane: The position remains as in my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government's reply of 6 February at column 925, to my hon. Friend's earlier question, except that the east Sussex third alteration was approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 9 May 1985. Berkshire county council is, I understand, considering the public response to its second consultation document on the review of its structure plans. Many of the policies in the plans for west and central Berkshire expire in 1986 and I hope therefore that the county council will see the need to submit a replacement plan before the end of this year.

Green Belt Policy

59. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to change his policy towards new house building on the green belt.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. In my Department's circular 14/84, we reaffirmed the objectives of green belt policy and the related development control policies.

Litter

61. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any further proposals to deal with the problem of litter.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. This is primarily a field for local action and initiative. Local authorities already have duties and powers relating to the cleaning of highways and other public places, and the Keep Britain Tidy group, which is financially supported by my Department, plays an important part in securing the collaboration of local authorities and other interests and groups in measures to prevent litter. The long term answer to the litter problem must lie primarily in persuasion and education.

Marine Nature Reserve

62. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the first marine nature reserve.

Mr. Waldegrave: It remains impossible to forecast exactly when the first reserve will be designated, but encouraging progress continues at two sites. I hope negotiations will be successfully concluded in 12 to 18 months.

Water Supplies (Nitrate Content)

63. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has now made a decision on the applications from a number of water authorities to secure exemption from limits of nitrate content in public water supplies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend will announce the decisions shortly.

Widdicombe Committee (Report)

64. Mr. Foster asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to publish the interim report of the Widdicombe committee before the House rises for the summer adjournment.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Widdicombe inquiry is expected to submit its interim report on local authorities' involvement in publicity and political campaigning by 31 July. Whether the subsequent publication of that report will precede the date on which the House rises for the summer adjournment is not a matter within my control, but it will certainly be published as soon as practicable.

Local Authority Manpower

65. Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current levels of local authority manpower compared with 1979, broken down into manual and non-manual staff.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the information from the joint manpower watch survey for local authorities in England:

Manpower (Full time equivalents)

	March 1979 (Thousands)	March 1985 (Thousands)	Change (Thousands)	(Per cent.)
Non-Manual	1,273·3	1,292·0	+18·7	+1·5
Manual	692·5	598·3	−94·2	−13·6
Total	1,965·8	1,890·3	−75·5	−3·8

Capital Spending Controls

66. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he intends taking to introduce a new system of capital spending controls.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We are considering a number of possible options with the local authority associations. We had a meeting with the associations on 20 May and there has been further correspondence since. Further work is being carried out, but I am not yet ready to bring forward proposals.

Football Hooliganism

67. Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will next meet the officials of the Football Association and Football League to discuss anti-hooligan proposals before the commencement of the 1985-86 football season.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 2 July at column 100.

Local Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

68. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Enironment what representations he has received from local authorities about difficulties experienced in meeting capital expenditure targets; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received quite a number of representations about the level of local authority capital allocations for 1985-86 and the reductions in the prescribed proportion of capital receipts which authorities may add to those allocations. I regret the effect on local authorities' programmes, but the measures were the very least necessary if we were to have any reasonable prospect of achieving our public expenditure plans for the year. As I announced on 26 June, at column 392, in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson), returns submitted by authorities show that there may still be an overspend in the main cash limit, but, in view of the uncertainty and the risk of disruption to authorities' programmes, I nevertheless propose no further action at present.

Housing Investment Allocations

70. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, considering 1986 investment allocations, he will take into account the liabilities of local authorities under the Housing Defects Act.

Mr. Gow: For the 1985-86 HIP allocations, an indicator was included in the generalised needs index to reflect the need for expenditure on publicly and privately owned defective PRC houses. The arrangements for the 1986-87 allocations are being discussed with the local authority associations, but I expect that this indicator will again be included.

Housing Statistics

71. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of occupied domestic heriditaments in Greater London, the number of people in that area receiving rate rebates and the number of local electors.

Mr. Waldegrave: The number of occupied domestic hereditaments in Greater London is estimated to be about 2·5 million. Based on local authority returns, the number of rate rebate recipients in 1984-85 is estimated to be 920,000. In the same year the number of electors was 5·06 million.

Local Authorities (Empty Houses)

72. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he plans to take to require local authorities to sell the empty houses currently in their possession.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to seek to reduce the number of local authority dwellings remaining empty for long periods; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: The public sector should take all possible steps to reduce the numbers of empty dwellings.

My Department is today issuing a circular to all local authorities in England with detailed guidance on measures to reduce the number of their empty dwellings by:

1. Better management of their reletting procedures;
2. Better management of their improvement programmes;
3. Greater use of short-life schemes and temporary lettings;
4. Sales to the private sector.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment had decided to promote the short-life use of empty local authority property by extending the eligibility for Housing Association grant ("Mini-Hag") to dwellings which are not scheduled for demolition. This should be of particular benefit to homeless families.

The Government encourage local authorities to sell vacant dwellings either directly into owner-ocupation, granting discounts to priority purchasers, or to developers for improvement and subsequent sale into owner-occupation.

Epping Forest

74. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he wil list the farmland and other estates of the Greater London council within the Epping Forest district of Essex; what consultations have been, and are being, held about their management after the abolition of the Greater London council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: My Department does not have comprehensive records of the farmland and other estates owned by the GLC within the Epping Forest district council area, but it is understood its holdings include the Woodredon and Warlies park estates; Debden estate; and land forming part of Hainault country park; but the position is being clarified in relation to individual sites. My right hon. Friend has published two papers of relevance to land owned by the GLC; statement (of November 1984) of decisions on GLC interests in land held under the provisions of the Green Belt (London and Home Counties) Act 1938; and memorandum on the transfer of property, rights and liabilities issued in March 1985.

In both cases he has invited representations from authorities about particular sites.

House Repair

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he anticipates that an appropriate repair scheme under the Housing Defects Act 1984 will be approved for Woolaway houses;

(2) when he anticipates that an appropriate repair scheme under the Housing Defects Act 1984 will be approved for Cornish unit houses.

Mr. Gow: PRC Homes Limited, a subsidary of the National House Building Council, has invited designers and builders to submit proposals for the reinstatement of PRC houses, designed before 1960, including the Cornish unit and Woolaway types. The NHBC has indicated that it will take about six weeks from receipt of the first applications for approval to be given. I hope that the first methods of repair for Cornish unit and Woolaway houses will be approved this autumn.

North Pennines Inquiry

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what briefing has been given to the inspector for the impending public inquiry into the proposed area of outstanding natural beauty in the North Pennines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: A brief will be provided for the inspector in due course and will be made available on request from the opening of the inquiry or at any pre-inquiry meeting.

North-East Hampshire Structure Plan

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 7 May, Official Report, column 299, if he will now make a statement on the report of the examination in public into the north-east Hampshire structure plan; and when the report and his response to it will be made public.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I am considering the report of the panel which conducted the examination in public into the submitted alteration to the north-east Hampshire structure plan. I hope to publish the report and proposed modifications soon.

Mount Pleasant Airport

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown of the £89 million required for the progress of the Mount Pleasant airport in the Falklands after 1 June.

Sir George Young: It is not the practice to disclose rates for particular components of Government contracts, but I can say that essentially the sum covers the balance of work to complete the secondary runway, aircraft apron, roads, buildings and services, together with the site clearance of temporary facilities when construction ceases and the usual provisions for retention pending the expiry of maintenance periods on work already completed.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) to whom the London Residuary Body will be accountable; and whether there are any plans for a review of its expenditure by the Audit Commission;

(2) if the validity of proceedings of the London Residuary Body will be dependent on an established quorum.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to clauses 55, 76 and 77 and paragraph 9 of schedule 13 to the Local Government Bill (Lords introduction print).

GLC (Grants)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why it has taken since 17 March to consider the Greater London council application under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act to make grants to Searchlight, Spare Rib and the Women's Peace Bus.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Because each application must be considered carefully and on its individual merits. Relevant information on the grant to Searchlight, for which consent has now been given, was not provided by the GLC until 20 May.

After the most careful consideration, consent to the proposed grants to Spare Rib and the Women's Peace Bus Co-operative has now been refused.

Conference Centre, Westminster

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if a name has been selected for the conference centre now under construction at Broad Sanctuary, Westminster.

Sir George Young: I am pleased to announce that the Queen has graciously agreed that the centre may be named The Queen Elizabeth II conference centre.

It has also been decided to name the main rooms in the centre generally after the British figures who have made a significant contribution to modern society. These rooms will be named as follows:

Auditorium—Churchill Auditorium
Conference Room 1—Fleming Room
Conference Room 2—Whittle Room
Conference Room 3—Rutherford Room
Conference Room 4—Henry Moore Room
Upper Conference Suite—Mountbatten Suite
Main Delegates' Lounge—Benjamin Britten Lounge
Small Delegates' Lounge—Nightingale Room
Press Lounge—Caxton Lounge
Small Dining Room—Abbey Room

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers' Salaries

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish figures to show the percentage increase in teachers' salaries in cash and real terms (a) from the implementation of the Houghton award to April 1979, (b) from the implementation of the Houghton award to April 1984, (c) from April 1979 to April 1984 and (d) from April 1979 to April 1985, assuming payment of the award currently offered by teachers' employers, in each case both allowing for and not allowing for incremental rises.

Sir Keith Joseph [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1985, c. 352]: Details of percentage increases in teachers' salaries in cash and real terms for the periods requested are as follows:

Per cent.

	Cash terms		Real terms
	(1) Settlements	(2) Average salaries	(3) Settlements	(4) Average salaries
(a) from Houghton to April 1979	65	79	−18	−11
(b) from Houghton to April 1984	181	221	−15	−3
(c) from April 1979 to April 1984	70	79	4	9
(d) from April 1979 to April 1985	78	89	2	8

Notes:

1. Columns (1) and (3) give the cumulative increase in pay levels as measured by annual settlements, compounded year on year. Column (1) is in cash terms. Column (3) is adjusted to reflect changes in the RPI during the periods in questions.
2. Columns (2) and (4) give average salary increases calculated from the annual count of teachers by scales and incremental points. The figures exclude heads and deputy heads. Column (2) is in cash terms. Column (4) is adjusted to reflect RPI changes.
3. The average salary figures reflect actual changes in salary levels arising from annual pay settlements, incremental drift caused by an ageing teacher force during a time of low recruitment-falling rolls, increasing proportions of senior posts because of higher staying on rates and so on. It is not possible to separate out the effect of incremental increases for the individual teacher.
4. The base for calculating the increases incorporates the results of the Houghton report and the April 1979 pay settlement. For (a) and (b) the base incorporates the effects of a negotiated settlement of 8 per cent. from 1 April 1974 plus an additional 27 per cent. recommended by the Houghton committee taking effect from 24 May plus the further 2 per cent. which the committee's settlement was estimated to be worth.
5. In extrapolating the figures to 1985 (Section (d)), 5 per cent. has been taken as the settlement increase, and in addition the average salary figures assume 0·6 per cent. for salary drift.

Geriatric Medicine

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many post-graduate students are at present studying geriatric medicine in Scottish universities.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not available.

Ethnic Minority Teachers

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how he intends to pursue the possibility of establishing acceptable arrangements for collecting and using ethnically based statistics on teachers and students in initial training.

Sir Keith Joseph: Following up our interest in increasing the supply of suitable teachers of ethnic minority origin, and an undertaking made in response to the Swann report, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have today issued a discussion paper concerning the collection of ethically based statistics on teachers and students in teacher training. It is proposed that a working group of the local authority associations, the Churches, the teachers' associations, and the Commission for Racial Equality should be established to look at the issues in more detail, concentrating initially on statistics on serving teachers. Comments from a wider audience will be welcome and will be made known to the working group. Copies of the discussion paper are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations have taken place with the education service and the ethnic minorities on ways of increasing the supply of ethnic minority teachers.

Sir Keith Joseph: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have today followed up an undertaking made in response to the Swann report, and have issued a discussion paper concerning measures to increase the proportion of the teacher force drawn from the ethnic minorities, without any reduction in the required level of qualification. Copies of the document are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Ethnic minority groups, and interested parties both within and outside the education service, are being asked to submit comments by 31 October, and comments will be welcome on the same timescale from any individual or organisation not specifically consulted. Further discussions may then be required to determine the most appropriate way forward.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

St. Winifred's Church, Birkenhead

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, whether there are any paid Church of England clergy at St. Winifred's church, Birkenhead.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Commissioners do not pay a stipend to any clergyman at St. Winifred's church, Birkenhead. They understand that the church is served by a clergy pensioner. The Commissioners provide the funds from which clergy pensions are paid.

Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, whether the Church Commissioners have paid any funds to St. Winifred's church, Birkenhead, during the past 10 years.

Sir William van Straubenzee: It would not appear so, but there has only been a restricted time in which to consult records.

WALES

Roads

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will analyse, for the most recently available 12-month period, the expenditure undertaken by his Department on each of the trunk roads in Wales, analysing such spending between routine maintenance and improvement and indicating the total length in miles of each of these trunk roads.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In 1984-85 our Department spent £93 million on new construction and improvement of trunk roads in Wales, and £12 million on their general maintenance. An attribution of this expenditure to each trunk road could be provided only at disproportionate cost, but information about the expenditure on major trunk road improvement schemes during 1984-85 is given in table I to class XVI, vote I, of the Supply Estimates for that year. (HCP 292—XVI).

Oil Spillage (Compensation)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make funds available to maritime district councils along the Cambrian coast to compensate them for exceptional expenditure incurred as a result of recent oil spillage in the Irish Sea.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Compensation for all reasonable oil pollution clean-up costs related to a spillage at sea by an identified tanker is available through international regimes. Affected local authorities should submit claims to the insurers as promptly as possible. The question of Government funds to meet exceptional expenditure does not therefore arise.

School Meals and Milk

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent per pupil in secondary schools in Wales on school meals and milk in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how this compares with the figure for 1978-79, at constant prices.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is not available.

TRANSPORT

Aircraft Noise

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what plans he has to review the standards for assessing aircraft noise nuisance and in particular for extending the noise preferential routes beyond their present altitude limits of 4,000 ft from Heathrow and 3,000 ft from Gatwick;

(2) whether he will review the definitions of aircraft noise intrusion so at to take account of severe and continuous noise intrusion from aircraft movements above 4,000 ft.

Mr. Ridley: I can assure my right hon. Friend that the assessment of aircraft noise nuisance is kept under review. With the progressive introduction of quieter types, levels of noise disturbance created by aeroplanes have been and will continue to be reduced. Although I accept that there are differing views about the altitudes at which aircraft noise ceases to be regarded as unduly intrusive, I have no plans to extend the noise preferential routes at Heathrow or Gatwick beyond their present limits.

Aircraft Movements

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will put forward proposals to the Civil Aviation Authority for variations in standard instrument depature routes so as to avoid prolonged periods of bunching of aircraft movements over specific communities.

Mr. Ridley: No. Although I appreciate that some communities experience more aircraft noise disturbance than others, I am satisfied that the present route structure represents the best balance that can be achieved by the Civil Aviation Authority in fulfilment of its various responsibilities, which include a requirement to take full account of disturbance to the public.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has held with the Civil Aviation Authority concerning the current routeing structure for aircraft movements at Heathrow and Gatwick; and whether, in the light of noise disturbance, he will put forward proposals for operating the structure on a rotational basis.

Mr. Ridley: My officials hold regular discussions with the Civil Aviation Authority and the National Air Traffic Services about these matters. To seek to change the present operational structure in the way that my right hon. Friend suggests would place an unacceptable capacity constraint on Heathrow and Gatwick.

Built-up Areas (Painted Lines)

Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider seeking to require coloured lines to be painted in the middle of roads in built-up areas in order to indicate to drivers that they are driving in built-up areas, during hours of darkness.

Mrs. Chalker: No. Coloured lines would be less conspicuous than the present white ones and differentiation between colours would be very difficult, especially with the lighting systems in current use.

Crediton (Bypass)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action is being taken to bypass Crediton.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is a matter for Devon county council, which is the highway authority responsible for the A377 principal road through Crediton.

North Devon Link Road

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects construction of the next section of the North Devon link road to commence.

Mr. Michael Spicer: As with all road schemes, progress is dependent on completion of the statutory processes. We will announce start dates for each of the remaining stages as soon as possible.

Driving Test

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average waiting time for a car driving test in England; and how this compares with Northampton.

Mrs. Chalker: The waiting time for a car driving test in Northampton is about 17 weeks, which is one week less than the average waiting time for England and Wales.

London Transport (Fraud)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much was lost as a result of fraud on London Transport for 1982 and 1983 and on London Regional Transport for 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 13 May, at column 1. I understand the details for 1983 were published in the London Transport Executive's annual report for that year.

CIVIL SERVICE

Government Statistical Service

Mr. Sayeed asked the Minister for the Civil Service what further progress has been made on increasing the value for money provided by the Government statistical service along the lines indicated by the White Paper, "Government Statistical Services" (Cmnd. 8236).

Mr. Hayhoe: During the 1984-85 financial year further annual savings of nearly £2 million have been found and the target of £26·5 million given in the White Paper has now been exceeded by some £5 million. That is an excellent achievement. The statistical service continues to seek economies and improve on value for money targets although these are becoming harder to achieve. Future improvements are likely to depend increasingly upon exploitation of computers and some further investment in this area will probably be required.

ENERGY

Electricity Slot Meters

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will have discussions with the North Western electricity board about the circumstances of the provision of slot meters to households, and how this relates to his Department's code of practice on payment of electricity bills.

Mr. Goodlad: I have no plans to do so. The industry's voluntary code of practice for domestic customers provides for the installation of slot meters, where it is safe and practicable, as one means of paying outstanding debt within a reasonable period.

Coal Industry, Leicestershire

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) pursuant to his reply to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West on 24 June, Official Report, column 630, upon what evidence he bases his statement that the numbers employed in the coal industry in the Leicestershire area will increase by the end of the century;

(2) pursuant to his reply to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West on 24 June, Official Report, column 630, how many and which pits he expects to be in production in the Leicestershire area by the end of the century; how much coal he expects each of those pits to be producing; and how many coalminers he expects to be employed in each of those pits;

(3) pursuant to his reply to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West on 24 June, Official Report, column 630, how many pits are in operation now; how many miners are now employed in each of those pits; which of those pits he expects to be in operation by the end of the century; and how many coalminers he expects to be employed in each of those pits by the end of the century;

(4) pursuant to his reply to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West on 24 June, Official Report, column 630, how many miners are now employed on work on the Asfordby project; how many he expects to be employed on that mine by the end of the years 1990, 1992, 1995, 1998 and 2000, respectively; and how many and what percentage of such miners he expects to be from the Leicestershire area;

(5) pursuant to his reply to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West on 24 June, Official Report, column 630, how many miners he expects each of the pits in the Vale of Belvoir and north-west Leicestershire coalfield apart from Asfordby to be employing; and how many and what percentage he expects to be from the Leicestershire area at the end of the century.

Mr. David Hunt: As I pointed out to the hon. Gentleman on 24 June, there will be a major boost to the numbers employed in the coal industry in the south midlands area when such major prospects as are planned at Cadley Mill, Daw Hill and Coventry together with the new prospects at Asfordby and south Warwickshire come to fruition. I also anticipate growth in the opencast sector. Detailed questions on numbers of pits, their personnel and production are a matter for the National Coal Board. There is a tremendous future for the coal industry, particularly in the south midlands if it can cut costs to take advantage of the market opportunities which will be there.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Doctors and Hospitals (Litigation Costs)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General what was the cost to the legal aid fund of providing legal advice regarding, and taking court action against, hospital doctors and hospitals in Northern Ireland during each of the financial years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

The Attorney-General: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General how many legal aid certificates were issued during each of the financial years from 1980-81 to 1984-85 with a view to litigation against hospitals or hospital doctors working in Northern Ireland.

The Attorney-General: Statistics in the form requested are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The following table shows the figures for certificates issued in the five-year period in cases alleging "medical negligence" which incorporates all medical causes of action, including those arising in hospitals.

	Number
1980-81	54
1981-82	63
1982-83	95
1983-84	149

A random check of a small sample of these cases indicates that approximately 80 per cent. of cases in this category relate to causes of action against hospitals or hospital doctors.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General in how many cases in which legal aid certificates were issued in the five years 1980 to 1985, for proposed actions against hospitals or hospital doctors in Northern Ireland, court action actually followed; of those, in how many cases damages were awarded against the defendant; and how many cases were dismissed.

The Attorney-General: Statistics in the precise form requested are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, information on "medical negligence" in general is available and is shown in the following table. These results are compiled from the number of cases concluded in each year and not from the number of legal aid certificates issued.

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Total cases concluded	20	22	26	34	46
Judgment for plaintif (with charges)	—	—	—	1	2
Judgment against plaintiff	1	—	—	1	—
Settled	6	5	5	23	17
Withdrawn	13	17	21	9	27

Legal Aid Scheme

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General what was the cost of advertising the legal aid scheme by television, public press and bill posting during each of the financial years 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 in (a) Northern Ireland, (b) Scotland and (c) England and Wales.

The Attorney-General: No records were kept of the cost of advertising the legal aid scheme in Northern Ireland prior to 1 April 1982, when the Lord Chancellor assumed responsibility. The cost of advertising the scheme in the financial years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 has been as follows:

1982-83	45,250
1983-84	36,420
1984-85	47,930

These costs include not only the cost of advertising the scheme in the ways mentioned in the question but also the production and supply of leaflets and posters and the publication of the legal aid solicitors list.

The provision of legal aid in Scotland is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. No public money has been used to advertise the legal aid schemes in Scotland or in England and Wales in the ways mentioned. However, a leaflet on legal advice and assistance in Scotland is available, at a cost to public funds of around £1,500 in each of the years to which the question relates. In respect of the scheme in England and Wales, various leaflets and posters, and a short film, have been produced; and information is available on Prestel. The cost to public funds of advertising the scheme in England and Wales in these ways for the years in question was as follows:

1980-81	16,000
1981-82	21,500
1982-83	28,500
1983-84	29,500
1984-85	64,500

Clifford v. Eastern Health and Social Services Board

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Attorney-General what was the cost to public funds of the case of Clifford v. Eastern health and social services board, otherwise Clifford v. Nicholl heard at court in Belfast on 22 April before His Honour Judge Andrew Donaldson, QC.

The Attorney-General: The estimated cost (which is not precise) with regard to areas of expenditure for which the Lord Chancellor is responsible is approximately £160. This does not include legal aid, which has not yet been assessed.

I understand that the cost to the Eastern Health and Social Services Board was £262.

Wrestling Competitions

Mr. Bright asked the Attorney-General in how many cases during the last year the Director of Public Prosecutions has considered the institution of criminal proceedings arising out of chain wrestling competitions; what are the principles taken into account by the Director of Public Prosecutions in reaching decisions on such cases; and whether any such proceedings have been instituted.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions has considered one case arising out of a "chain wrestling" competition. Chain wrestling competitions differ from the traditional sport in that a substantial chain links the two wrestlers together. A combatant who finds himself in a position to use the chain as a weapon is permitted to do so. As to the relevant legal principles, the Court of Appeal has ruled that it is not in the public interest that people should try to cause each other actual bodily harm for no reason. Further, it is not a defence to a charge of assault arising out of a fight, whether occurring in public or in private, that the victim consented to fight. It is an assault if actual bodily harm is intended and/or caused. But the Court of Appeal emphasised that its ruling was not intended to cast doubt on the accepted legality of properly conducted games and sports.

It is likely that the courts would regard the introduction of a chain as a potential weapon as distinguishing such a competition from lawful sport. Any injuries which might be occasioned by its use would thus be distinguished from those which do sometimes occur in the normal course of robust but lawful sporting competitions. Their infliction might constitute assault or a more serious offence of unlawful wounding or grievous bodily harm depending upon the nature and degree of the injury.

In the case considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions the evidence was insufficient to establish that actual harm had been occasioned by the use of the chain.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Short Brothers

20. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that Short Brothers is able to export its products freely to the Philippines.

Mr. Channon: The Government are making every effort to ensure that Shorts, in common with other United Kingdom companies, can export its products successfully to the Philippines.

Research Vessels

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Her Majesty's Government will introduce measures to promote the continuance of a body of expertise in building research vessels in one British shipyard.

Mr. Butcher: We have no plans to do so. This is a matter for the commercial judgment of the British shipbuilding industry.

Theatrical Street Productions Ltd.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action has been taken by his Department in relation to Mr. Martin Cannon, trading as Theatrical Street Productions Ltd., to ensure compliance with the Fair Trading Act and other legislation.

Mr. Fletcher: Theatrical Street Productions Ltd. was wound up compulsorily in the High Court on 10 December 1984 and its affairs are being investigated by the Official Receiver in conjunction with other authorities.

Motor Vehicles

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list his powers to require car manufacturers to state the British value added percentage in each marque in their product range.

Mr. Fletcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of motor car, lorry and bus exports to the European Economic Community, respectively, including Portugal and Spain, over the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available; what were the comparable figures in each of the previous five years; and what were the comparable figures for imports of cars, lorries and buses, respectively, from the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Shipbuilding (Korea)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to seek to stop the Korean Government-subsidised tenders on United Kingdom shipbuilding contracts; and if he will also seek the withdrawal of the Trinity House lighthouse tender contract.

Mr. Butcher: Through our active participation in the dialogue between the OECD working party on shipbuilding and the Government of the Republic of Korea we continue to press for pricing arrangements which can best ensure the health of the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry with the long term aim of the phasing out of all subsidies worldwide. The decision to place the lighthouse tender contract in Korea was a matter for Trinity House and no public money was involved. The Government concluded that the level of subsidy that would have been necessary to keep the order in the United Kingdom could not have been justified.

Excavators (Japan)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the EEC Council of Ministers has imposed anti-dumping duties in a range up to 32 per cent. against imports of hydraulic excavators from Japan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Anti-dumping duties ranging from 2·9 per cent to 31·9 per cent. were imposed with effect from 7 July on imports of hydraulic excavators manufactured by a number of Japanese companies. The relevant Council regulation (No. 1877/85 of 4 July) represents the conclusion of an investigation conducted by the Commission following complaints by the Community hydraulic excavator industry. The investigation found that Japanese excavators were being dumped in the Community market and that this dumping was causing material injury. The anti-dumping duties will remain in force for five years or until reviewed.

EC (Anti-dumping Measures)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on how many occasions anti-dumping measures have been enforced by the EEC over the past five years in cases when the exporting nation has made proposals to the Commission for increased prices to remove the extent of the alleged dumping.

Mr. Channon: A definitive remedy in cases where foreign manufacturers are found to have dumped their products in the European Community to the detriment of Community industry can take the form of an anti-dumping duty or the acceptance of a price undertaking.

The discussions between the Commission and a foreign manufacturer following the offer of a price undertaking are confidential: some offers are rejected. In approximately three quarters of anti-dumping cases over the past five years, price undertakings have been accepted as the definitive remedy.

Recycling

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what have been the results to date of the contact between the Minister responsible for recycling and the United Kingdom Reclamation Council.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 394]: When I met representatives of the United Kingdom Reclamation Council on 12 March, they indicated that there were areas in which the council would be able to suggest some recycling initiatives. I have asked for another meeting before the summer recess to discuss what the council has decided to do and possible ways in which the Government might help.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about current Government policy on waste recycling and whether he intends to make any changes.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985, c. 394]: I refer the hon. Member to the second special report from the Trade and Industry Committee, Session 1984-85, where he will find the Government's response to the Committee's report "The Wealth of Waste."

At an open day at the Warren Spring laboratory on 10 July I announced my intention to establish a unit at the laboratory to provide technical support, including the preparation of statistical and economic data and state of the art reports, to private and public sector organisations in the recycling field. The unit would cost around £200,000 per annum, and I am looking to industry for a 50 per cent. contribution. I am also planning a campaign to raise public awareness of the potential for reclamation and recycling.

EMPLOYMENT

Training

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are now on each of the following schemes: full-time job release, part-time job release, young workers scheme, job splitting scheme, community programme, community industry, enterprise allowance scheme, youth training scheme and training opportunities scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is estimated as follows, for 31 May:

	Numbers
Community programme	134,000
Enterprise allowance scheme	47,000
Job splitting scheme	240
Job release schemes	64,000
Young workers scheme	52,000
Community industry	8,000
Training in industry	1,500
Youth training scheme	280,000
Training opportunities scheme	27,820

Registered Unemployed Persons

Mr. Baldrey asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether the names and addresses of those who are registered as unemployed at unemployment benefit offices are available to managers of local jobcentres.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since October 1982 and the introduction of a Rayner recommendation that registration for employment at a jobcentre for adults be voluntary, the names and addresses of those signing at unemployment benefit offices have not been automatically passed to jobcentres. This information has, however, been made available on request.

Unemployed young people under 18 still have to register for work, either at a jobcentre or careers office, as one of the conditions for receiving benefit.

Petrol (Price Increases)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will estimate the effect on the retail prices index of the increases in the price of petrol during each month in the current year.

Mr. Alan Clark: In March and April, increases in the price of petrol and oil added, respectively, 0·2 and 0·1 per cent. to the level of the retail prices index. There were negligible effects in other months.

PRIME MINISTER

Falkland Islands (Fishing)

Q38. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether the Soviet Government have approached the United Kingdom with any request for fishing licences to operate in the waters around the Falkland Islands and about their approach to the Argentine Government on the same subject.

The Prime Minister: No.

South Derbyshire

Q58. Mrs. Currie asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit South Derbyshire.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Anglo-Irish Council

Q129. Mr. Randall asked the Prime Minister if she proposes to increase the secretariat of the Anglo-Irish Council.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Hancock asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 11 July.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 11 July.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 11 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will state her official engagements for Monday 8 July.

The Prime Minister: In the morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others including one with the Chiefs of Defence Staff. In the afternoon I had further meetings, including one with the Prime Minister of Trinidad and Tobago.

National Health Service

Mr. Hickmet asked the Prime Minister what improvements have been made to the National Health Service since May 1979; and how the standard of patient care provided in National Health Service hospitals compares with that which existed prior to May 1979.

The Prime Minister: The National Health Service is now treating more patients a year than ever before. This has been achieved by spending more money and taking steps to see that Health Service money is used to better effect. We are also developing a more modern health service better fitted to care for and prevent sickness and respond to changing demands.

We believe that the National Health Service's aim is to meet the needs and convenience of public and patients and we have been pleased by the recorded satisfaction of the public with the National Health Service. A recent opinion poll has shown that over three-quarters of the public thought the service "very good". The increased level of service provided is shown by the facts that, comparing 1984 with 1978:

over ¾ million more in-patient cases were treated;
over ¼ million more day cases were treated;
there were over 3 million extra outpatient attendances;
health visitors and home nurses visited or treated ¾ million more people, ¼ million of them elderly; over 1 million more children aged five and under attended child health clinics;
the number of coronary artery by-pass grafts rose from 3,191 in 1978 to 9,443 in 1984, an increase of nearly 200 per cent.;
there were over 4½ million more courses of dental treatment;
the number of new renal patients accepted for treatment has increased by 60 per cent. The number of patients being treated for end stage renal failure rose from 5,390 to 9,330, an increase of 73 per cent. For most renal patients, the preferred method of treatment is by kidney transplant; the Government launched a campaign, in February 1984, to increase the number of organs becoming available for transplant and to provide the donor card scheme. During the following 12 months, kidney transplants rose by 35 per cent., from 1,089 to 1,470; latest figures (September 1984) show that the waiting list for hospital treatment has been reduced after rising by almost 250,000 between 1974-1979. It would have been lower still but for the 1982 industrial action. This downward trend has been achieved at a time when there are increasing demands for treatment and when the Health Service is treating more patients than ever before; it must also be remembered that half of all admissions to hospitals are immediate and many of those on the waiting lists will have firm dates for planned admissions.

This improved performance has been supported by record spending on the health service. Total spending has more than doubled from £7¾ billion in 1978-79 to a projected £17½ billion in 1985-86. By 1984-85, expenditure has increased by more than 20 per cent. measured against general inflation. These extra resources have been more than enough to meet the growth in demand resulting from the increasing numbers of elderly people. Capital spending has increased by over 20 per cent., in real terms, following a cut of one-third, under the previous administration. As a result 52 major hospital schemes costing over £5 million each, have been started since 1979. One hundred and fifty eight further projects are currently being designed or are under construction. Health authorities are planning further development worth over £123 million.

We have provided record levels of financial support but we are also succeeding in achieving better value for money spent in the health service. This has been the key to enabling the Service to treat more patients than ever before. A first step was to simplify the structure of the health service by abolishing one tier-area health authorities. From 1 April 1985, independent family practitioner committees directly accountable to the Secretary of State for Social Services were established. Other steps have been taken or are in train to achieve clearer accountability and better management within the health service. These include:

annual accountability reviews by Ministers of the performance of regional health authorities at which objectives are set and RHAs held to account for their achievements. The review process has now been extended to district health authorities and their units;
the appointment — as recommended by the (Griffiths) management inquiry report on National Health Service management which we commissioned — of general managers, with personal responsibility for performance, at regional and district level and in hospitals and other units; and the revision of management structures to complement this;
management has been aided by a series of initiatives to enable National Health Service authorities to scrutinise and improve their own performance. This includes Rayner-style efficiency scrutinies on particular aspects of health service activity; the development of performance indicators to enable health authorities to compare their service with those provided by other authorities;
a major review of National Health Service information requirements and systems (the Körner review): health authorities are now implementing the results;
improved audit;
the development of management budgeting, involving doctors, to improve resource usage and control;
a report on the disposal of under-used and surplus land and buildings, following which health authorities are re-examining their property holdings to free resources for patient care; competitive tendering for hospital support services to test their cost-effectiveness: significant and growing savings (already some £13 million) are being realised for patient care;

the introduction of health authority cost improvement programmes: health authorities planned to make cost improvements valued at £100 million in 1984-85, and are planning further improvements worth £150 million for 1985-86; better arrangements for the planning and control of manpower, so that the proportion of staff providing direct patient care (eg doctors and nurses) has continued to rise. By September 1983 there were over 5,000 more hospital doctors and dentists and nearly 57,000 more nurses and midwives than in September 1978.

These improvements in management and efficiency are directed at not simply more treatment for patients but also a better quality of service. This is reflected not only in developments in acute services mentioned above and advances in new forms of diagnosis and treatment (e.g. previously untreatable eye conditions which now make use of laser techniques) but also in progress made towards the development of the priority services for the elderly, mentally ill and mentally handicapped people.

In addition, we have been making real achievements in the prevention of health and social problems. We have seen a reduction of 33 per cent. in perinatal mortality between 1979 and 1983; reductions in cigarette smoking; the development of urgent plans by health authorities to tackle drug misuse; new campaigns on rubella immunisation, and measures to combat glue sniffing and drug and alcohol misuse.

In the field of primary care opticians' unjustified monopoly in the dispensing of glasses has been ended. The drug bill has been reduced by a selected list of prescribable medicines in certain categories and savings are already being used to improve other parts of the NHS. In 1984 there were over three thousand more family doctors and nearly 2·5 thousand more dentists than in 1978-79. The average family doctor's patient list size had reduced from 2,253 in 1978 to 2,068 in 1983.

We have welcomed the development and expansion of the private sector of health care. The compulsory phasing out of pay beds from National Health Service hospitals has been ended and we are working to encourage closer co-operation between private hospitals and the National Health Service for the benefit of patients. About 4·5 million people now choose to cover themselves with private medical insurance, providing a useful supplement to the total sum of health care, and relieving pressure on the National Health Service.

These massive improvements in the volume and standard of care provided by the National Health Service have not been achieved by the Government alone. We have taken steps which were necessary to enable those who work in the service to raise its standards of performance. I would like to pay tribute to the dedication and hard work of the overwhelming majority of all types and grades of staff in the Service, doctors and nurses, administrators and treasurers, cleaners and porters, who serve the patients so well. We have provided more finance, clearer planning and decision making and improved management to expand the service that their efforts provide.

Commercial Relationship

Dr. McDonald asked the Prime Minister if she will move to get up a tribunal of inquiry under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921 to inquire into the commercial relationship between Johnson Matthey Bankers and the Gomba-related companies; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I see no purpose in the establishment of such an inquiry.

Fontainebleau Agreement

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister in what way (a) the Fontainebleau agreement and (b) the United Kingdom European Economic Community rebate are dependent on the outcome of the International Conference established by majority vote at Milan.

The Prime Minister: No part of the Own Resources Decision which embodies the Fontainebleau agreement on the future financing of the Community, including the arrangements for the United Kingdom's abatement, is dependent on the outcome of the intergovernmental conference established by the Milan European Council.

Terrorism

Mr. Terlezki asked the Prime Minister if, during her discussions with the President of the United States of America, the option of an international news black-out on terrorist activities was discussed; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The question of media handling of terrorist incidents in the United Kingdom is under consideration by the Home Secretary. I have not yet discussed the question of international handling of reporting about terrorist incidents with President Reagan but would welcome the opportunity to do so, and indeed believe the topic merits wider international discussion.

Petrol Prices

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister when she next expects to meet representatives of the oil companies to discuss the effect of petrol prices on the economy.

The Prime Minister: I do not expect to meet the oil companies for this purpose.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa (Famine Relief)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report that part of the Dublin summit communiqué or decision which related to the pledge to provide 1·2 million tonnes of famine relief for Africa; and whether the relief concerned was designed to be in addition to the aid provided bilaterally by individual member states.

Mr. Raison: The full conclusions of the European Council of 3-4 December 1984 are available in the Library of the House. The relevant extract is as follows:

"In the face of the serious difficulties currently being experienced by many countries of Africa, especially those, like

Ethiopia or the Sahel countries, which are suffering the effects of an unprecedented drought and the ravages of malnutrition and famine, the European Council stresses the urgency of taking concerted international action.

The European Council believes that the total to be provided by the Community and its member states between now and the next harvest should be 1·2 million tonnes.

The Commission, after consultation with member states to establish the amount of grain that will be provided by member states, will make a proposal to the Council with respect to any additional Community effort that may be needed to attain the figure of 1·2 million tonnes and the European Council invites the Council of Ministers to take any necessary decisions on the basis of such a Commission proposal in order to secure the achievement of the 1·2 million total. The European Council appeals to other donor countries to match this effort by the Community and its member states in order that the total need of those states, currently estimated at 2 million tonnes, will be met."

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 5 December 1984, at column 352, it was the intention of the European Council that 1·2 million tonnes of cereals should be provided by the Community and member states together.

Falkland Islands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Falkland Islands-based firms, which do not have outside ownership, have received grants or loans from the Falkland Islands Development Corporation.

Mr. Raison: Forty-five.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the minutes and agendas of the board of the Falkland Islands Development Corporation are available to the public.

Mr. Raison: No. But an annual report will be produced and will be available to the public. The first should be published at the end of July.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 14 June, Official Report, column 569, if he will list the 54 companies which have received assistance from the Falkland Islands Development Corporation.

Mr. Raison: A total of 48 firms or individuals have received assistance from the Falkland Islands Development Corporation, not 54 as stated in my reply of 14 June, at column 569. I regret this discrepancy, which arises from the fact that a few received assistance over more than one project and were double counted previously. For reasons of commercial confidentiality, the corporation does not disclose information about assistance it has given without the prior consent of the firm or individual concerned.

Africa (Food Aid Commitment)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further information emerged from the EEC co-ordination meeting on 8 July in Brussels regarding the actual amount of food aid sent to the drought stricken nations of northern and east Africa in pursuance of the food aid commitment made at the Dublin summit.

Mr. Raison: The European Commission reported that 43 per cent. of the 1·2 million tonnes of cereals or cereal equivalent pledged at the European Council in December 1984 had been delivered to the African countries most severely affected by drought, and that a further 34 per cent. was now being mobilised.

The following information was provided on deliveries to each of the countries of the Sahel and East Africa:

	Tonnes of cereals or cereal equivalent
	Community	Member States	Total
Ethiopia	81,500	*65,000	146,500
Sudan	85,500	82,500	168,000
Chad	*20,000	30,000	50,000
Mali	*28,500	12,000	40,500
Mauritania	—	6,200	6,200
Niger	29,500	32,500	62,000

* Figures are lower than those given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on 6 June, at columns 198-99, or to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) on 5 July. This reflects previous over-reporting of deliveries effected.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Staff Levels)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the staff levels for each year since 1979 in the police service nationally.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information for England and Wales is as follows:

At 30 June	Police officers	Full-time civilian staff	Part-time civilian staff	Total manpower (including part-time civilians on a 2 for 1 basis)
1979	112,262	31,193	8,064	147,487
1980	115,353	32,481	8,254	151,961
1981	118,718	33,709	8,315	156,585
1982	120,370	33,806	8,049	158,201
1983	121,158	34,055	7,851	159,139
1984	120,987	34,778	7,601	159,566

Sentenced Persons (Transfers)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many foreign prisoners serving sentences in the United Kingdom on the most recent convenient date would be eligible for transfer from the United Kingdom under the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons; and from which countries they originate.

Mr. Mellor: The convention comes into force in relation to the United Kingdom on 1 August 1985; by that date the convention will also apply to France, the United States, Sweden and Spain. In addition, the convention comes into force in relation to Canada on 1 September. On 30 April this year the number of prisoners serving sentences in England and Wales who gave their nationality as that of one of these countries, and who were then eligible for repatriation under the terms of the convention by virtue of the length of sentence still to be served, was estimated as follows:

	Number
France	8
United States of America	33
Sweden	1
Spain	15
Canada	14

I understand that no eligible prisoners appear to be serving sentences in Scotland or Northern Ireland.

Motor Cycles (Noise Levels)

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions took place and how many convictions were obtained, in the five years culminating in the most recent year for which figures are available, for the use of motor cycles not silenced to a noise level within the permitted maximum.

Mr. Mellor: The available information relates to proceedings at magistrates' courts for noise caused by a faulty silencer in a motor cycle, moped or scooter and is given in the following table.

Proceedings and findings of guilt at magisrates' courts for noise caused by a faulty silencer on motorcycles, mopeds and scooters. England and Wales

Number

Year	Proceedings	Findings of guilt
1979	1,833	1,750
1980	2,448	2,338
1981	2,465	2,315
1982	2,790	2,616
1983	2,672	2,527

Cable Television

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made by each of the companies allocated the original 11 interim franchises for cable television; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that parts of the systems in Aberdeen and Swindon are now operational and programme services are being provided to subscribers. The systems in Coventry, Croydon and Westminster are currently being installed and services are expected to start in there September. In the Clyde area, Ealing and Windsor, construction work is expected to begin shortly with a view to commencing operations towards the end of this year or early next. The remaining three areas — Merseyside, Belfast and Guildford — are in various stages of planning and may be in a position to serve their first customers in the early part of next year.

Wales (Criminal Offences)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the total numbers of criminal offences in Wales in each of the years 1979 to 1984; and of these what were the total numbers of burglaries and sexual crimes for each of the five years, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: Statistics of notifiable offences recorded by the police in Wales are published annually in Criminal Statistics, England and Wales (Tables 2.4 and 2.6 of the volume for 1983, Cmnd. 9349). Corresponding figures for 1984 were published in Home Office Statistical Bulletin, Issue 6/85 on 12 March 1985.

Prison Service

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total strength by grades including governors at 31 March of the prison service in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers, by grades, of Prison Service staff at outstations on 31 March were as follows:

	Numbers
Prison Officer Grades	18,400·5
Administration Grades	2,262·5
Industrial staff	2,143·0
Civilian Instructional Officer and Professional and Technology Officers	1,132·5
Governors	542·0
Storemen	422·0
Doctors and nurses	296·5
Chaplains	107·5
Psychologists	94·5
Cleaners	60·0
Farm Managers	31·0
Messengers	14·0
Assistant Librarian	1·0

The number of Prison Service headquarters staff on 31 March was as follows:

	Numbers
Non Industrial (mainly administration group grades)	1,482·0
Industrial (mainly based at Supply and Transport Branch Headquarters at Corby)	362·5

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average basic salary excluding allowances and overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: The average basic annual salaries excluding overtime and allowances in the financial year 1984-85 were:

Governor I	22,605
Governor II	20,283
Governor III	16,744
Governor IV	13,455
Assistant Governor	11,654
Assistant Governor (trainee)	11,219
Chief Officer I	10,643
Chief Officer II	9,854
Principal Officer	8,116
Senior Officer	7,245
Prison Officer	5,744
Prison Auxiliary	5,348
Night Patrol	5,673

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average gross salary including allowances and overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: Governor grades received no payment in addition to their basic salaries except that they were provided with either rent-free quarters or a rent allowance of up to £2,135 a year, and those working in London were paid London weighting of up to £1,300 a year. The average gross annual salary, including overtime payments and allowances for shift and weekend working, of each of the prison officer grades in the financial year 1984-85 was:

Chief Officer I	15,079
Chief Officer II	14,190
Principal Officer	15,808
Senior Officer	14,230
Prison Officer	11,396
Prison Auxiliary	10,097
Night Patrol	9,515

In addition, prison officers in all grades other than prison auxiliary and night patrol were provided with either rent-free accommodation or a housing allowance of £1,060 a year (£1,353 for the Chief Officer grades). All grades working in the London pay area receive London weighting of up to £1,300 a year, and some officers were also paid an allowance, varying in amount, in recognition of certain specialist skills.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average overtime for each grade including governors for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: The average overtime worked by prison officers was 16·4 hours per officer per week. Small amounts of overtime were also worked by other grades. The pay and conditions of service of governor grades take account of the need for them to attend for whatever hours are necessary for the performance of their job. Overtime allowances are therefore inapplicable to them.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentages of officers had a gross salary in excess of (a) £13,000, (b) £14,000 and (c) £15,000 for the financial year 1984-85 in the prison service in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: This information could only be obtained at a disproportionate cost.

Magistrates' Courts

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of the magistrates' courts system in the most recent convenient financial year.

Mr. Mellor: The provisional outturn figure for the cost of the magistrates' courts system in 1983-84 was £141,284,000.

Fines

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money was received in fines paid by offenders in the most recent convenient financial year.

Mr. Mellor: The total income from fines and fees collected by magistrates' courts in England and Wales in 1984-85 was £123,642,000.

Compensation Orders

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money was paid by offenders under compensation orders in the most recent convenient financial year.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available centrally, and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Dog Fighting

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has secured in regard to the incidence of the practice of organised dog fighting, the incidence of importation of dogs in pursuit of this activity and the stealing of dogs for the purpose.

Mr. Mellor: Organised dog fighting is illegal under the Protection of Animals Act 1911. We have no present reason for believing that there is any widespread abuse, but the police are always ready to act upon evidence of such objectionable activities. We are not aware of any recent evidence to suggest that dogs are being imported or stolen for this purpose.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were in prison on 9 July; how many were held in police custody on the same date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: On 5 July, the latest date for which figures have been collected, 47,832 persons were held in Prison Department custody, plus 96 prisoners in police cells.

Home Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what grants are, or have been, paid to any police authority for home defence other than civil defence as defined in the Civil Defence Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None. Only the home defence activities which fall within the definition of civil defence in the Civil Defence Act 1984 are eligible for grant aid.

Police Vehicles (Excise Duty)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many vehicles, which are not chargeable with vehicle excise duty by virtue of regulation 27 of the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations 1971, are in the possession of each police authority in England and Wales:

(2) how many vehicles which are not chargeable with vehicle excise duty by virtue of regulation 27 of the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations 1971, are in the possession of each local authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None of which we are aware.

Opinion Polls

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider introducing legislation banning all opinion polls carried out by national press, local press, television, radio, colleges and universities 14 days before the polling day; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Civil Defence Review

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will publish the background papers to the civil defence review of 1980.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The review covered a wide range of activities many relating to the defence of this country, and it would not therefore be in the public interest to publish these papers.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those local authorities which have, since 1 December 1983, applied for grant aid for the purpose of establishing, equipping or maintaining an emergency centre or centres pursuant to regulation 4(1)(b) of the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983; and in each case what was (a) the date on which the application was made, (b) the proposed location of the centre or centres, (c) the total cost of the project as indicated in the application for grant approval, (d) whether the application has been approved, (e) if the application is still awaiting approval, why it has not yet been approved; and (f) if the application was disapproved for what reason.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Visitors

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will list the number of visitors to the United Kingdom in each of the last five years who have been recorded on the current computer system as those whose embarkation is likely to need checking; if he will provide a breakdown by nationality of those visitors listed above; if he will list the criteria employed in determining the recording of those listed above; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I will reply as soon as possible.

Local Radio Services

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to widen the range of consumer choice in local radio services.

Mr. Brittan: In reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 23 January, at columns 417 to 418, I said that I hoped to make a further statement about community radio following a study of how its development could best to taken forward. I have now decided to establish an experiment to test the viability of and scope for a range of different types of community radio, set up and financed in different ways in different locations. I hope that frequencies will be available for about 20 experimental stations which could begin broadcasting early next year. In general these will be appreciably smaller in coverage than existing local radio services. The central criterion will be that they should enhance existing broadcasting arrangements and broaden the diversity of consumer choice by offering the community in question an additional service which is distinct in character, whether because of the nature of the programming, its emphasis on local or specialist interests, its appeal to specific community concerns, for other reasons. It will be open to a number of bodies to come together to apply jointly for a licence on the basis that they will use the frequency on a time share basis; and, given the limited number of frequencies, this will have advantages. I intend to make a further announcement as soon as possible setting out the locations for the experimental community radio stations, and outlining the application procedure for prospective licensees. In selecting the successful applicants, I hope to have the benefit of advice from a panel of advisers.

As outlined in my earlier statement, however, the development of community radio raises a number of important broadcasting policy issues, and may in addition have implications for our existing local radio services. I have therefore decided that it would be right for these matters to be the subject of wider consultations, and I propose to publish a Green Paper in summer 1986 identifying the issues, outlining a range of possible responses, and inviting comments on them. When the Green Paper is published the experimental stations should have been operating for some months, and that experience should help inform consideration of the issues outlined in the Green Paper.

Existing local radio services normally broadcast the same programmes on medium wave and VHF frequencies. I have from time to time, however, approved ad hoc requests from the broadcasting authorities for particular stations to broadcast separate programmes on the two frequencies for a temporary period in order to meet particular local needs or circumstances. Stations have thus been able, for example, to provide a special emergency information service during periods of severe weather, to provide commentary on sporting events, and to help with charity appeals, while maintaining their normal output on the other frequency. Both the IBA and the BBC have recently put to me proposals for experiments in split-frequency broadcasting over a longer period. The IBA have asked that six independent local radio stations (Piccadilly Radio, Leicester Sound, Marcher Sound, Viking Radio, Wiltshire Radio and Capital Radio) should be permitted, as and when appropriate, to broadcast seperate programmes on their two frequencies for up to 10 hours per week. The purposes to which the additional service would be devoted include classical music concerts, ethnic programming, sporting commentaries and specialist music programmes. The BBC have sought approval to Radio Nottingham and Leicester broadcasting Asian programmes for a few hours a week on one frequency while carrying their normal services on the other.

I have decided to approve these proposals for an experimental period of one year. Arrangements have been made for research, including audience research, into the experiment. At its conclusion, I propose to undertaken a careful assessment of the practical and other implications of split-frequency broadcasting. I shall continue to be prepared to consider ad hoc requests for particular stations to undertake split-frequency broadcasts of short duration in the light of exceptional local needs or circumstances.

Fire Service (Discipline)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to issue guidance to the fire service on the procedures to be followed under the Fire Services (Discipline) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 930).

Mr. Brittan: I have today placed in the Library a copy of the guidance to be issued to chief fire officers. This guidance has been the subject of consultation with both fire authorities and representative bodies in the fire service, and I formally consulted both national joint councils over its terms when I consulted them over the draft regulations under section 17 of the Fire Services Act 1947. The guidance represents the agreed procedure for handling cases under the new regulations and I am confident that it will be welcomed by all concerned as an integral part of the new discipline provisions and as the means of best achieving natural justice in disciplinary matters consistent with the needs and traditions of the fire service.

Firearms Act

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if in the light of recent disclosures of the contents of the report of Sir John McKay's working party on the administration of the Firearms Act 1968 he will now place a copy of the report in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 5 June 1985, c. 159]: It would be inappropriate to do so. The report of Sir John McKay's working party on the control of firearms, prepared in 1972, was an internal document. Its main conclusions and recommendations were, however, incorporated in the 1973 Green Paper, "The Control of Firearms in Great Britain" (Cmnd. 5297).

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Duchy of Lancaster (Magistracy)

Mr. Robert Sheldon asked the Lord Privy Seal (1) what approaches the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster makes to political parties to obtain nominations for the magistracy within the Duchy;

(2) what action the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster takes to ensure political balance in the magistracy within the Duchy;

Mr. Biffen: The Secretaries of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's advisory committees are advised to keep in contact with the local political parties, as well as with other local organisations, to encourage them to recommend persons for appointment as magistrates. They also maintain a record of the party allegiances of magistrates where these are known at the time of appointment. Thereafter the committees do their best to ensure that new appointments improve upon the political balance of the bench as and when it becomes necessary to do so.

Accommodation

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many hon. Members (a) have their own office on the parliamentary estate, (b) share such an office (i) with one other, (ii) with two others, (iii) with three others, (iv) with four or more others, (c) have some other form of accommodation, including a desk, and (d) have no such allocated accommodation; and if he will give the reasons for those in the last category.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is as follows:

	Numbers
(a) Hon. Members with their own room	273
(b) Hon Members who share a room
(i) With one other	242
(ii) With two others	30
(iii) With three others	32
(iv) With four or more others	62
(c) Hon. Members who have some other form of accommodation	Nil
(d) Hon. Members who have no allocated accommodation	11
Total	650

The reasons for those in the last category are not known. I should add, however, that all new Members are sent a leaflet by the Serjeant at Arms Department, which explains how they can apply for accommodation.

Visual Display Units

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Lord Privy Seal, pursuant to his reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe of 26 June, Official Report, column 401, if he is satisfied that people who work with visual display units in the Palace of Westminster do not face any health hazard in consequence of their work with them; if any trade union with members employed within the Palace has been consulted on this matter; and if any consideration has been given to compulsory eye tests for those employed or to be employed on visual display units.

Mr. Biffen: I have been assured that there is no current evidence that visual display units, properly used, constitute any threat to health; regular discussions about employment on VDUs are taking place with officials of trade unions representing staff of the House; it is not considered appropriate for eye tests, presently available on a voluntary basis to those staff employed or to be employed on VDUs, to be made compulsory.

Health and Safety

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Lord Privy Seal, pursuant to his reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe of 26 June, Official Report, column 401, whether the safety committee to which his reply referred also deals with health matters affecting people who work in the Palace of Westminster; and if he will name the trade unions with which formal consultation takes place on health and safety matters affecting their members employed in the Palace.

Mr. Biffen: The safety committee consults with the Department of the Environment and other relevant bodies over the elimination of any hazards reported to it. The following unions represent House of Commons staff on the safety committee:

(1) Association of First Division Civil Servants (FDA)
(2) Civil and Public Services Association (CPSA)
(3) Civil Service Union (CSU)
(4) General Municipal Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union (GMW Section) [incorporating Hotel and Catering Workers' Union (HWCU)]
(5) Institution of Professional Civil Servants (IPCS)

(6) Society of Civil and Public Servants (SCPS)

Photocopying Equipment

Mr. Cartwright asked the Lord Privy Seal whether the use of photocopying equipment supplied to the Labour party in the House is restricted to 12 copies on the basis of other photocopying machines within the House.

Mr. Biffen: The photocopying equipment provided for the official Opposition is not subject to any restrictions on its use.

Members' Secretaries

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many secretaries accredited to hon. Members were in possession of photographic passes on 1 July; if he will publish a table showing the number of Members with nought, one, two and three, and so on accredited secretaries; what information he has as to the number of such secretaries working for one, two, three and so on hon. Members; and if he will give comparative figures for each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Biffen: The number of Palace of Westminster photo-identity passes on issue to Members' secretaries on 1 July 1985 was 612. The information requested on the number of secretaries employed per Member is as follows:

	Numbers
Members employing no secretary	192
Members employing one secretary	342
Members employing two secretaries	79
Members employing three secretaries	23
Members employing four secretaries	5
Members employing five secretaries	5
Members employing six secretaries	1
Members employing seven secretaries	0
Members employing eight secretaries	0
Members employing nine secretaries	1

It is understood that 15 secretaries work for two Members, and one secretary works for three Members. I regret that the records which are held by the authorities of the House do not enable me to give comparative figures for the other years requested.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Objects in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Faulds asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, with reference to the answer to the hon. Member for Warley, East on 17 June, Official Report, column 28 about the review of the Vote arrangements governing the acceptance of works of art and museum objects as payment in kind of capital tax liabilities, he is now able to make a statement setting out the Government's policy in this regard.

Mr. Peter Rees: The review of the Vote arrangements governing the acceptance of assets in lieu of tax is in progress. A statement will be made in due course.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United Kingdom, each of the EEC Six, the United States of America and Japan the change in the real exchange rate since the average of the years 1973 to 1976 based on (a) relative gross domestic product deflators, (b) relative export prices for manufactures and (c) relative unit labour costs; and if he will include figures showing the current nominal rates in each case compared to March 1983, the fourth quarter of 1984 and January 1985.

Mr. Ian Stewart: A variety of indices of relative costs and prices for the countries and period requested compared with other major industrial countries are available in the table "Cost and Price Comparisons for Manufacturing" in International Financial Statistics. Nominal effective exchange rate indices for the period requested are available in successive issues of the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin (table 18).

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the indices of competitiveness in Table F3 of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics for the United Kingdom" compared with Germany for the average of the years 1973 to 1976, the fourth quarter of 1976, the first quarter of 1979, the first quarter of 1981, the first quarter of 1973, the fourth quarter of 1984, the lastest available month in each case and his estimate of the current position, together with the appropriate nominal exchange rate aginst the deutschemark.

Mr. Channon: I have been asked to reply. The information is in the table. For the indices of import price competitiveness and relative profitability of exports (also in table F3), price information specific to UK-German trade is not readily available.

Interest Rates

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will list the factors currently preventing an immediate cut in interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 27 June (Vol. 81, c. 489).

Official Reserves

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the United Kingdom official reserves for the month of June in each of the last 10 financial years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: At the end of June 1985 the official reserves stood at $14,318 million. Figures for previous years are available in Economic Trends, Annual Supplement, 1985, pp. 143-145.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Services)

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many local authorities have put all or any of their professional services out to the private sector;

(2) how many local authorities have selected outside firms to operate the work undertaken by the former direct labour organisation as opposed to giving the in-house organisation the work;

(3) how many local authorities have put more than one service into the private sector.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department does not collect systematic data on these subjects, but useful information may be found in the annual surveys of local authority privatisation which the Local Government Chronicle has published since 1983.

GLC (Press Officers)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many press officers are employed by the Greater London council; and what total cost this represents to ratepayers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I regret that the information requested is not available centrally. This is a matter for the GLC.

Newham

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his reasons for not having accepted the revised financial information provided by the London borough of Newham for the financial year 1982 to 1983; what differences his refusal has made on Newham's block grant entitlement; and what will be the effect on the council's 1984-85 and 1985-86 budget.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My right hon. Friend does not consider that the revised financial return provided by the London borough of Newham gives the best information as to their outturn total expenditure for 1982-83. This revised return would reduce Newham's block grant entitlement in respect of 1982-83 by about £2½ million. What effect it would have on Newham's budget in 1984-85 and 1985-86 is a matter for the council.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what plans he has for emergency legislation to deal with the budget situation of the city of Liverpool;

(2) if he will meet a deputation of hon. Members from Liverpool to discuss the city's deficit budget.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Liverpool city council has now made a rate and declared a budget. It is for that council to live with the consequences of its decision. I have agreed to meet a deputation of hon. Members.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to appoint a commissioner to run the affairs of the city of Liverpool.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have no powers to do so.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what arrangements exist for consultation between the London Docklands Development Corporation and the population in the London docklands area; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what efforts are made by the London Docklands Development Corporation to let the Docklands Forum know what its plans are; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I will answer these questions shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will undertake an investigation into ways and means to reduce the London Docklands Development Corporation's administrative costs; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: This subject will be covered in today's debate on the environment committee's report on my Department's main Estimates 1985-86 and I do not propose to make any further statement.

Major Precepting Authorities

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is meant by a major precepting authority, as referred to in his Department's press notice No. 276; and if he will list those he intends to have included on London borough rate demands for 1986-87.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Major precepting authority means any county council, the receiver of the metropolitan police, and any new authority with power to issue precepts which it is proposed to establish by clause 67 of the Local Government Bill. In the case of a London borough it is intended that the rate demands will show the amounts in respect of the borough rate, the precepts of the receiver of the metropolitan police and of any new authority with the power to issue precepts as established by the Local Government Bill, including the Inner London Education Authority, and of any levy payable in respect of the residuary body established under the Bill or in respect of London regional transport.

Capital Works (Grants)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what grants were authorised to be paid by his Department for capital works carried out under the Civil Defence (Water Supplies) Regulations 1949 in each of the financial years 1978-79 to 1984-85, inclusive; to which authorities; and for what purposes;

(2) what grants were authorised to be paid by his Department for capital works carried out under the Civil Defence (Sewerage) Regulations 1949 in each of the financial years 1978-79 to 1984-85, inclusive; to which authorities; and for what purposes.

Mr. Macfarlane: Grant authorised by my Department since 1978-79 for capital works relating to water authority civil defence functions has been for structural and accommodation works for new control centres as follows:

Water Authority	Financial Year	Amount of Grant (75 per cent. of cost) £
Yorkshire	1983-84	4,066
	1984-85	33,434
Anglian	1983-84	15,000
	1984-85	75,000
Wessex	1983-84	9,576
	TOTAL	137,076

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chile

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what mechanisms and procedures the Government have to evaluate the effectiveness of their policy on human rights in Chile.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's embassy in Santiago maintains contact with a wide variety of opinion in Chile and reports regularly on human rights issues. As I indicated to the House on 26 June, at column 407, we wish to encourage the process of restoring democratic freedoms in Chile.

Argentina

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) on 8 July, what evidence he has for stating that commercial and economic relations offer a natural opportunity for better relations with Argentina in relation to the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Renton: The answer referred to by the hon. Member placed our action on imports from Argentina in the general context of restoring more normal relations between Britain and Argentina.

As my right hon. and learned Friend told the House on 14 March, at column 498, both countries have a clear interest in improved trade. Both the Argentine Government and the IMF have stressed the need for Argentina to increase her exports. The removal of restrictions on trade would help to restore confidence between our two Governments and peoples.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 8 July to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) if he will estimate the benefits to employment in the United Kingdom to be derived from the lifting of restrictions on trade between the United Kingdom and Argentina.

Mr. Renton: Our decision to lift the restrictions on imports from Argentina into the United Kingdom should have a beneficial effect on employment among importers and users of Argentine raw materials whose business had suffered as a result of the embargo. If, as we hope, the Argentine Government take reciprocal action, benefits to employment should be correspondingly greater. At this early stage the extent of these benefits cannot be quantified.

Falkland Islands

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in seeking to establish a multilaterally-based fisheries conservation and management regime around the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Renton: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr Robert Kilroy-Silk) on 3 July, at column 172.

Human Rights

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give, for judgments delivered by the European Court of Human Rights against signatory nations of the European Convention on Human Rights, the date of judgment, the name of the country affected, the articles in question, and brief details of the nature of the judgment since 1955, or such more recent date as information is readily available.

Mr. Renton: The European Court of Human Rights has given judgments finding breaches of the convention in cases brought against Austria, Belgium, the FRG, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. A number of these countries have cases pending against them, as has France. The further information requested by my hon. Friend is being assembled and I shall arrange for it to be published in the Official Report.

Namibia

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the Government's position on meetings with the new interim Administration in Namibia and with the representatives of political parties in that country.

Mr. Rifkind: As we have already made clear, we have not met and will not meet representatives of the so-called "interim administration" in Namibia. As in the past, we shall maintain informal contacts with all Namibian political parties, including both SWAPO and the internal parties.

Departmental Broadcasting Responsibilities

Mr. Walden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is able to enlarge on the observations he made last October in reply to the Foreign Affairs Committee report on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and Overseas Development Administration Supply Estimates 1984-85 concerning the transfer of his Department's broadcasting responsibilities to the British Broadcasting Corporation, Cmnd. 9367.

Mr. Renton: After consultation with the BBC it has been decided that a full transfer is not feasible at this stage. In the meantime, we plan to rationalise the present arrangements as far as possible.

We have agreed with the BBC board of governors arrangements whereby the BBC will provide management and technical support for the transmitting and relay station at Orfordness from April 1986. The relay station at Crowborough will be closed down in accordance with existing plans.

There will be no change in our international agreements and the status of the British east Mediterranean relay station (BEMRS) in Cyprus and the British eastern relay station (BERS) in Oman will remain unchanged. The BBC will provide technical staff support where required by the FCO. Locally engaged staff at both these stations will continue to be employed under the same terms and conditions as before.

Existing members of the FCO broadcasting group will be considered for transfer to other posts in the FCO, or to other Departments in the Civil Service or to the BBC if that is their wish. The BBC has confirmed that it will give sympathetic consideration to applications from any members of the broadcasting group who may wish to transfer to the BBC. Any member of the staff who cannot be found alternative employment will be eligible for premature retirement in accordance with the Civil Service model redundancy agreement.

By reducing the present element of duplication in management, planning and engineering, the rationalisation programme is expected, on the basis of discounted cash flow calculations over 25 years at 1985 prices, to produce average annual savings of the order of £300,000 per annum with no reduction either in the current operational capability of external services broadcasting or in the improved audibility programme.

It is considered that there would be advantage in consolidating the capital provisions for the BBC external services, which are currently divided between class II, vote 1 (Overseas Representation) and class II, vote 3 (BBC External Services). Accordingly, Parliament will be invited to vote the money required in 1986-87 on a single Supply Estimate which would be that covering the grant-in-aid of the BBC external services.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Nephrops

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the proposed European Economic Community market support scheme for the nephrops industry; whether the scheme would be optional; whether under the scheme the grading by size of nephrops would be optional; what representations he has made to the European Economic Community Commission on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government have received a range of representations on market support for nephrops following the agreement on the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Community.

Discussions on the European Commission's detailed scheme for private storage aid for this species have only just commenced and I have undertaken to keep interested parties informed as they proceed.

Vitamin E Information Exchange

The Reverend Martin Smyth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has yet met representatives of the Vitamin E Information Exchange; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: No. As I told the hon. Member in my reply of 10 May, at column 522, vitamin E is present in adequate amounts in any likely diet in this country.

European Community Agricultural Budget

Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the likely effect on the European Economic Community agricultural budget of a Soviet 1985 cereal harvest 25 million tons in excess of that in 1984; and what plans have been made to cope with this contingency.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that it is not possible to make such a forecast.

Sugar Prices

Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will compare the European Economic Community price of sugar with that on the world market; and if he will make a statement including the cost to (a) the consumer and (b) the taxpayer of the current EC sugar regime.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Agricultural Expenditure

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which sectors of agricultural spending or spending related to agriculture were not covered by the 20·6 billion ecu limit agreed for agricultural spending in 1986 at the meeting of the Council of Finance Ministers on Monday 8 July; and if any limits have been fixed for spending in these excluded categories.

Mr. Jopling: The 20·6 billion ecu is the maximum level of expenditure from the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund (excluding fisheries) in 1986 calculated by the Commission for the Community of Ten in accordance with the financial guideline. It does not include expenditure from the guidance section of the fund (634 Mecu in 1984) or the items of agricultural expenditure financed from chapter 38 of section IIIB of the Community budget, notably animal health measures and agricultural research (56 Mecu in 1984).

The amount of financial assistance that may be charged to the guidance section of the EAGGF is limited under article 6 of Regulation (EEC) No. 729/70, currently to 5,250 million ecu for the period 1985 to 1989. In addition all non-obligatory expenditure in the Community budget (which includes the majority of chapter 38 of IIIB and some of the guidance section) is subject to the maximum rate of increase provided for in article 203 of the EEC treaty.

Community expenditure as a whole is covered by the reference framework which is established at the beginning of the budgetary procedure in accordance with the Council's conclusions on budget discipline.

Milk Quota

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make it his policy to seek to buy in enough milk quota to honour supplementary quota without any percentage discount.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1985]: I am very conscious that some producers have been hard hit by the cut-back on development awards and am looking at ways of helping them from within the quota presently available. But I can offer no prospect of a further injection of Government funds beyond that already announced to buy up more quota for this purpose.

SCOTLAND

Hospital Beds

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many hospital beds are available in each health board area for elderly people in need of specialist care and attention.

Mr. Younger: The staffed hospital beds available for elderly patients at 31 March 1984 (the latest available date) were as follows:

	Number
Argyll and Clyde	982
Ayrshire and Arran	705
Borders	241
Dumfries and Galloway	326
Fife	629
Forth Valley	589
Grampian	1,019

Geriatric Care

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses are in post in each health board area for the nursing of geriatric patients.

Mr. Younger: The whole-time equivalent numbers of trained nurses and nursing auxiliaries employed in geriatric hospitals and in long-stay units mainly for geriatric patients at 30 September 1984 are as follows.

Health Board	Trained Nurses (whole-time equivalent)	Nursing Auxiliaries (whole-time equivalent)
Argyll and Clyde	153·0	241·7
Ayrshire and Arran	181·0	228·2

Scotland	2,379·3	2,677·9

Statistics of nurses in training at these hospitals are not available. Geriatric patients are nursed also in general and geriatric beds in general and teaching hospitals, but the number of nursing staff involved cannot be separately identified.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many doctors with specialist qualifications are in post in each health board area for the treatment of geriatric patients.

Mr. Younger: The number of consultants engaged wholly in geriatric medicine in Scotland as at 30 September 1984 is as follows. (Whole-time equivalent numbers are given in parenthesis.) Geriatric patients are also treated by consultants in many other specialties.

Health Board	Consultants in geriatric medicine
Argyll and Clyde	4	(4·0)
Ayrshire and Arran	3	(3·0)
Borders	2	(2·0)
Dumfries and Galloway	2	(2·0)

Lothian	11	(9·9)
Orkney	—	—
Shetland	—	—
Tayside	8	(7·6)
Western Isles	1	(1·0)
Scotland	68	(66·2)

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many elderly men and women are on the waiting list for treatment as geriatric patients in each area health board.

Mr Younger: The latest available information which relates to 31 March 1984, is as follows:

	Number on Waiting lists
Ayrshire and Arran	90
Borders	64
Argyll and Clyde	162
Fife	205
Greater Glasgow	0
Highland	75
Lanarkshire	508
Grampian	143
Orkney	57
Lothian	219
Tayside	145
Forth Valley	97
Western Isles	13
Dumfries and Galloway	29
Shetland	0
ALL SCOTLAND	1,807

Lists tend to overstate numbers of patients waiting for treatment. It is not possible to provide separate figures for men and women.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional resources he proposes to make available to area health boards for the provision of additional beds and nursing for geriatric patients.

Mr. Younger: The age structure of the population is one of the factors taken into account in determining the allocation among boards of resources for their hospital and community health services. For the current year, these resources have been increased by 5·5 per cent. in cash terms compared with 1984-85. In using these funds boards are expected to be guided by the recommendations in the report "Scottish Health Authorities' Priorities for the Eighties", which give high priority to services for the elderly.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide local authorities responsible for day centres for the elderly with additional resources to maintain and expand the service.

Mr. Younger: The number of day centre places provided by local authorities has risen from 1,355 in 1979 to 1,845 in 1984. Over the same period, places in centres provided by voluntary agencies rose from 2,168 to 2,676. It is for authorities to determine local priorities, but the Government's planning figures for social work services will continue to take the needs of the elderly into account.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many elderly people are presently accommodated in local authority and voluntary old people's homes in each regional council area of Scotland.

Mr. Younger: The information requested is as follows:

Regional Council	Local Authority Homes	*Registered Homes	No. of Residents aged over 65 years (Estimated at 31 March 1984)
Borders	296	190	486
Central	354	216	570

TOTAL—SCOTLAND	8,564	4,899	13,463

* These are mainly homes run by voluntary bodies, but a small number of privately run homes are included.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many district nurses are available in each health board area to visit elderly sick people in their own homes.

Mr. Younger: The whole-time equivalent number of district nurses available in each health board area in Scotland at 30 September 1984 is as follows:

Health board	Number of district nurses expressed as whole-time equivalents
Argyll and Clyde	161·3
Ayr and Arran	112·7

The figures exclude the community nurses (670·0 whole-time equivalents) who combine midwifery, district nurse and health visitor duties.

In 1984, 57·7 per cent. of visits by district nurses were to people aged 75 and over and 80·4 per cent. to people aged 65 and over.

Health Boards (Expenditure)

Mr. Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the full text of all letters sent recently to health boards in Scotland instructing them to reduce their expenditure by 5 per cent.

Mr. John MacKay: I wrote on 3 July to the chairmen of the five health boards which have been reluctant to test the cost effectiveness of their support services by seeking competitive tenders, requesting them to achieve by the end of the current financial year cash savings on their catering, domestic and laundry services equivalent to at least 5 per cent. of their expenditure on these services in 1984-85. These savings will remain available to the boards for their services to patients. I have placed copies of my letters in the Library.

Edinburgh City Council

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken in respect of Edinburgh's budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: On 22 May Edinburgh district council was notified that my right hon. Friend considered its planned expenditure for 1985-86 to be excessive and unreasonable and that he accordingly proposed to reduce the council's rate by 5·2p. The council submitted its representations on this proposal on 12 June and my right hon. Friend and I met representatives of the council to discuss these representations on 17 June. On 3 July my right hon. Friend laid before Parliament a report seeking approval to a reduction of 5·2p in the council's rate. On housing, following the report of the local inquiry on 20 May, my right hon. Friend made an order requiring the district council to revise its estimated rate contribution to its housing revenue account and to reduce the district rate by an additional 1·8p; the district council has refused to comply and the Lord Advocate has now applied to the Court of Session for an order of specific performance.

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to appoint a commissioner to run Edinburgh city council.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend has no power to do so.

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will meet a deputation of hon. Members from Edinburgh to discuss Edinburgh's budget.

Mr. Ancram: There will be a full debate in Parliament next week on my right hon. Friend's proposals to reduce the rate of Edinburgh district council, and hon. Members will have ample opportunity to make known their views. In these circumstances it does not seem necessary for my right hon. Friend to meet hon. Members at this stage.

Police Vehicles

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many vehicles, which are not chargeable with vehicle excise duty by virtue of regulation 27 of the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations 1971, are in the possession of each police authority in Scotland;

(2) how many vehicles, which are not chargeable with vehicle excise duty by virtue of Regulation 27 of the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations 1971, are in the possession of each local authority in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: I have no reason to believe there are any such vehicles in Scotland at present.

Primary and Secondary Schools

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by region (a) the primary schools and (b) the secondary schools which were closed during 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 17 June 1985, c. 32]: In the period September 1982 to September 1984 the following closures of schools or departments were reported:

NORTHERN IRELAND

Sinn Fein

15. Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will now ban Sinn Fein.

Mr Scott: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so at present.

Housing (Category 3 Repairs)

16. Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average length of time taken by the Housing Executive to complete a category 3 repair.

Mr. Chris Patten: These are non-essential repairs not requiring immediate attention. They are grouped with similar requests and carried out as part of planned maintenance schemes. The chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive has advised me that information on the average length of time for such repairs is not readily available.

Agriculture

17. Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the future prospects for Northern Ireland agriculture.

Dr. Boyson: The agriculture industry will continue to make a vital contribution to the well-being of Northern Ireland. The industry faces significant pressures at present, but I expect it to remain a strong and stable sector of economic activity in Northern Ireland, to which this Government attach considerable priority.

Home Improvement Grants

18. Mr. Beggs: asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if Government proposals to means test home improvement grants will be applied to Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government's proposals for restructuring of home improvement policy in Great Britain have not been finalised. When they are, I will consider them in relation to Northern Ireland's special housing needs.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what manpower his Department has achieved in 1984-85.

Dr. Boyson: For the Northern Ireland Office the position is as follows:

	Staff in post
	1 April 1984	1 April 1985
Home civil servants	181	175
Northern Ireland civil servants	1,229	1,185
Northern Ireland prison service	2,988	3,087

The increase reflects continued recruitment for the Northern Ireland prison service.

On 1 April 1984 the staff in post in the Northern Ireland Departments numbered 25,145; on 31 March 1985 the total was 24,909.

Gas and Oil Exploitation

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what geological surveys have been carried out off the North Antrim coast to investigate the reserves of gas and oil; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what applications for licences have been made for gas and oil exploration off the North Antrim coast; which applications have been granted; and which refused, giving in each case the grounds for refusal.

Dr. Boyson: Two offshore seismic surveys have been completed by companies which held petroleum licences for areas of land and sea along the north coast of Counties Antrim and Londonderry. Much more prospecting will have to be undertaken in this area before there will be any indication of its potential for gas or oil.

A petroleum licence covering an area of 138 sq miles onshore and offshore centred on Rathlin Island was applied for and granted in 1980 but was revoked on 28 June 1985 as a consequence of non-fulfilment of licence commitments. Three competing applications were received for an area of 545 sq miles onshore and offshore along the north coast of Counties Antrim and Londonderry. In 1980 these were assessed on the basis of the proposed programmes, the technical competence of the applicants, their financial resources and their exploration experience. A licence for the area was granted in 1982.

"Come On Northern Ireland"

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how much the Industrial Development Board's "Come on Northern Ireland" advertising campaign on commercial broadcasting outlets has cost to date indicating the cost of producing the commercials, the cost of advertising them on independent television and independent radio; and how much more is to be spent on this campaign;

(2) how much the Industrial Development Board has spent on promotional advertising in local newspapers, provincial newspapers, British national newspapers, Irish national newspapers and foreign newspapers, respectively, on the "Come on Northern Ireland" campaign; and how much more is to be spent in this way in the remainder of this financial year;

(3) if he will make a statement on the purpose of the "Come on Northern Ireland" advertising campaign run by the Industrial Development Board and on its achievements to date.

Dr. Boyson: The aim of the "Come on Northern Ireland" campaign is to create a greater awareness of the role of the Industrial Development Board and to stimulate good will, support and involvement of all sections of the community in the effort to bring about the regeneration of the Northern Ireland economy. Follow-up research has indicated that it has been broadly successful in its aim. There are complementary campaigns aimed at local industry and overseas investors using the themes "With a little help from your friends" and "Judge us on the facts," respectively.

The total cost of the local TV campaign for 1984-85 was £124,000 including VAT (production £55,000, screen time £69,000). The budget for 1985-86 allocated for this campaign is £45,000 which is mostly for screening. There has been no radio advertising. The Industrial Development Board budget for newspaper advertising, the bulk of which relates to the drive for inward investment, has been as follows:

Type of Newspaper	1984-85 £	1985-86 £
NI Local (including provincial)	35,000	80,000
British National	192,000	67,000
Irish National	Nil	Nil
USA/Canadian	310,000	777,000
European	232,000	135,000
Far Eastern	50,000	158,000

Heavy Vehicles

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prosecutions have been made under the Road Traffic, Transport and Roads (NI) Order 1984 against persons who have driven heavy vehicles on the public highway which have been in excess of the permitted maximum axle weight; and in how many cases a conviction resulted.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the maximum penalty for driving a heavy commercial vehicle on the public highway in excess of the maximum permitted axle weight; in how many cases conviction has been followed by the imposition of the maximum penalty; and how many convictions were of Northern Ireland and of Republic of Ireland residents.

Mr. Chris Patten: £2,000. This penalty has yet to be imposed.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present maximum axleweight upon which a heavy commercial vehicle may travel on public roads in Northern Ireland; and how this limit has changed in the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: 10,500 kg, which represents one increase from 10,170 kg in the previous five years.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what additional resources have been made available to enforce the provisions of the Road Traffic, Roads and Transport (NI) Order 1984 with regard to vehicle inspection and illegal parking of heavy commercial vehicles;

(2) how many prosecutions have been made under the Road Traffic, Transport and Roads (NI) Order 1984 against persons who have parked heavy vehicles on verges or footways; in how many cases a conviction resulted; and how many of those convicted were resident within Northern Ireland and how many in the Republic of Ireland;

(3) what is the maximum penalty for parking a heavy vehicle on a verge or footway; and, in how many cases a conviction has been followed by the imposition of the maximum penlty.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Bomb Attacks (Newry and Killeen)

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary on the investigation into the mortar attacks at Newry and the car bomb attacks at the courthouse in Newry on 3 April and at Killeen on 20 May, indicating how many investigating officers were involved, their ranks, how many hours they spent on this inquiry, whether they sought to reconstruct the scenes of the incidents concerned, how many pages their report to the Chief Constable occupied, what conclusions were reached in their report about the operational dispositions of the police before, during and after each incident, what recommendations were made to the Chief Constable, and to what extent these have been implemented; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report, with particular reference to the adequacy of the personal protection provided to the police officers incolved.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Flags and Emblems Act

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he proposes to seek to repeal the Flags and Emblems Act.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to do so. The Act does not ban the peaceful flying of the Irish tricolour in Northern Ireland but we keep the need for, and use of, the Act under review, particularly in the light of the Government's commitment to recognise and respect the identities of both traditions in Northern Ireland.

Criminal Injuries (Compensation)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to publish his proposals for amending the Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (N.I.) Order 1977; and at what date he intends that the new provisions shall be used as a basis for compensation.

Mr. Scott: [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1985]: My right hon. Friend hopes to publish proposals for the amendment of the order, including proposed operative dates, later this year.

SOCIAL SERVICES

LD50 Test

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if a decision has now been reached in consultation with the Medicines Commission to amend the "Biological Compendium" to replace the LD50 animal test for the antibiotic dactinomycin with an alternative such as high pressure liquid chromatography; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. We have decided, after consultation with the Medicines Commission, that the LD50 animal test should no longer be required for dactinomycin. Reference to the test will be deleted from the "Compendium of Licensing Requirements for the Manufacturing of Certain Biological Medicinal Products".

Social Security Review

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether it is envisaged that the proposed rate for teenagers referred to in paragraph 2.77 of "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9518) will include 13 to 17-year-olds, or 13 to 19-year-olds or some other age range;

(2) whether, under the proposals in the Green Paper, "The Reform of Social Security", it is intended that non-dependant 16 and 17-year-olds should receive the same rate of income support as that payable for dependent teenagers.

Mr. Tony Newton: The Green Paper, "Reform of Social Security" contains no proposals on the eligibility to benefit of young people but invites views on changing the structure of the scale rates for children. We will consider detailed arrangements for the support of children and young people in the light of the comments received.

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated number of retirement pensioners who will lose benefit as a result of (a) the difference between the 7 per cent. uprating of the basic retirement pension and the 5·8 per cent. rise in the housing benefit needs allowance, (b) the change to the housing benefit taper, and (c) the combination of both of these; and what is the estimated average loss of benefit in each case.

Mr. Newton: A precise estimate of the numbers whose benefit will be affected by the difference between the increase in the retirement pension and the housing benefit needs allowance could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The different increases arise from the different uprating factors which have been used for several years to calculate changes in benefits and allowances. This year single pensioners will normally gain as a result of this difference, while the reduction in housing benefit for a pensioner couple will not normally exceed 18 pence a week for a tenant, and five pence a week for an owner occupier.

An estimated 1·5 million pensioners will be affected by the change to the rates taper above the needs allowance, and on average their housing benefit will be 47 pence a week less than it would otherwise have been. The differences in increases to the retirement pension and the needs allowance will mean that the effect of the change in the rates taper will normally be a little less for a single pensioner and slightly greater for a pensioner couple.

Benefits (Uprating)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for each of the upratings proposed for July 1986 and April 1987, which month's retail price index will be used to determine the uprating and when each uprating will be announced; and if he will estimate the extra cost of the upratings compared with an uprating in November 1986 and 1987 assuming that inflation is a constant 5 per cent. throughout the relevant period, in each of the financial years 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kempton, on 25 June at column 381. The uprating would be announced, as at present, shortly after the publication of the retail prices index for the relevant month. Expenditure in 1985-86 is not affected. On the assumption given, there would be an additional cost in 1986-87 of about £150 million. In 1987-88 the effect would be broadly neutral.

Prisons

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what extent the terms of reference of community health councils include the oversight of the prison medical service where there is one of Her Majesty's Prisons in their locality; and whether he will enter into consultations with a view to clarifying their terms of reference.

Mr. John Patten: Community health councils have a duty to represent the interests in the health service of the public in their districts. This does not extend to the prison medical service, for which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is accountable to Parliament. Medical facilities in individual establishments are subject to scrutiny by boards of visitors and inspection by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons, whose reports to my right hon. and learned Friend are published.

Natural Medicines

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what progress he and his officials are making in resolving the difficulties facing the manufacturers of natural, homoeopathic and herbal medicines, resulting from his Department's proposals to remove licences from certain categories of natural medicines;

(2) if he will make a statement on his policy towards natural medicines, the likely effect of the current review under the Medicines Act on their future and his assessment of their contribution to the health of the nation;

(3) when he proposes to appoint specialists in the practice of natural, homoeopathic and herbal medicine to the Medicines Commission, the Committee for the Review of Medicines and the Committee on Safety of Medicines;

(4) if he will take steps to form a committee of advisers expert in the practice of natural, homoeopathic and herbal medicine, in accordance with the provisions of the Medicines Act 1968;

(5) if he will list the specialists in the practice of natural, homoeopathic and herbal medicine who now advise him on the Medicines Commission, the Committee for the Review of Medicines and the Committee on Safety of Medicines, according to the provisions of the Medicines Act 1968.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I welcome the opportunity to make clear the Government's position on the important issues raised by my hon. Friend. We wholeheartedly support the freedom of the individual to seek the benefits of alternative medicines and therapies. The Medicines Act 1968 contains specific provisions to ensure that doctors and pharmacists can supply individual patients with whatever medicine they believe is needed including alternative medicines and there are also specific provisions for herbal products. My hon. friend can be assured that it is not our intention to use this legislation to restrict the general availability of alternative medicines.

Under European Community requirements, it is necessary for medicinal products already on the market when the licensing system began for new products in 1971, to be reviewed by 1990. This requirement includes herbal medicines. It does not include homoeopathic or other alternative medicines which will not be reviewed until after 1990 unless in a particular case there is a specific safety hazard.

The review is being carried out by our Department as licensing authority under the Medicines Act, with the advice of the Committee on the Review of Medicines and, where appropriate, of the Medicines Commission. Of particular importance in this review are the safety and quality of medicines publicly available and on this we need the advice of doctors and pharmacists in our Department and on the advisory bodies, who are experts on the possible adverse effects of substances on the human body and on the safeguards needed in manufacture of medicines. As regards efficacy, it is proposed that for herbal medicines, and other medicines, intended for minor self-limiting conditions, the licensing authority should not require formal clinical trials, which are considered necessary when claims are made for serious illness. Instead the authority would rely, where appropriate, on existing bibliographical information. We are engaged in discussions on these matters with representatives of herbal manufacturers and others concerned.

Membership of the Committee on the Review of Medicines includes a pharmacist who has expertise in herbal products and pharmacognosy. We do not consider it necessary now to alter the membership of advisory bodies or to increase their number. But there are wide powers to add to the membership of these bodies either temporarily or permanently as the need arises and we shall keep this matter under careful scrutiny in the coming years.

We are confident that it will be possible to deal with the public sale and supply of alternative medicines in a way which recognises the special factors which apply in this area, but which also recognises the public expectation that medicines on public sale or supply shall satisfy adequate standards of safety and quality and shall not make claims, especially for serious conditions, unless these are well-founded.

If there are any particular difficulties as regards licences for alternative medicines that my hon. Friend wishes to raise with me, I shall be glad to hear from him.

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to amend Statutory Instrument No. 41 of 1975 concerning the Medicines Act 1968.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to statutory instrument No. 41 of 1978—the Medicines (Labelling and Advertising to the Public) Regulations. We are currently considering amendments to this legislation and these were the subject of a consultation letter sent to all interested organisations in May 1983 (reference MLX 148). Copies are in the Library.

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with expert advisers on natural, homoeopathic and herbal medicine represented on the Medicines Commission, the Committee for the Review of Medicines and the Committee on Safety of Medicines, about whether there are safe natural medicines available in the treatment of intestinal colic in young babies which avoid the side effects of the drug Dicyclomine.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have held no such discussions. There are no natural products which have full product licences for use in the treatment of intestinal colic in young babies. If a company thinks they have a product which is safe and efficacious in the treatment of this condition they can apply for a product licence and their data in support of the application will be considered. Any licences of right for natural products used in the treatment of infant colic will eventually be considered by the licensing authority and if necessary by the Committee on the Review of Medicines.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under what circumstances a claimant can work on (a) Saturdays, (b) Sundays and (c) after normal working hours and continue to claim full unemployment benefit.

Mr. Whitney: Unemployment benefit is a daily benefit payable for six days a week for Monday to Saturday. A claimant can work on those days and continue to receive benefit only if his earnings do not exceed £2 for the day, he is available to be employed full-time on that day, and the work done is not in his usual main occupation (unless it is done for, for example, a charity). Whether the work is done after normal hours is irrelevant. Work on a Sunday does not affect unemployment benefit because benefit is not payable for that day.

In addition to this, it is a basic principle of the unemployment benefit system that benefit should not be paid for days on which a claimant would not normally be employed. Thus, if he has worked to the full extent that he would normally work in a week, benefit is not payable for the days on which he does not work. In this context it does not matter whether the work is done on Sunday or other days, or at what hours. Whether a person has worked to his full normal extent is a question for decision by the independent statutory authorities on the facts of the particular case.

Health Visitors

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the present level of recruitment into the nursing speciality of health visitor.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of health visitors (including field work teachers and multiple duty staff) employed by the National Health Service in England at 30 September 1983, the latest year for which detailed information is available, was 9,708, an increase of 2·2 per cent. over the previous year. We are advised by the English National Board for Nursing Midwifery and Health Visiting that the number of health visitors entering training in England in the year ended 31 March 1985 was 848 compared with 925 in 1984. It is for health authorities to decide, in the light of local priorities and the resources available to them, how many health visitors they should employ and how many trainees they should recruit to meet service needs. A recent survey for the Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives and Health Visitors showed that only 1·2 per cent. of all whole-time equivalent funded posts for health visitors remained vacant for over three months.

Ex Gratia Payments

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a copy of the document setting out his Department's policy on ex gratia payments.

Mr. Whitney: Our policy is not set out in any single document, but is based on the reports made by the Public Accounts Committee over the years and on precedents agreed with the Treasury in individual cases. In general terms, an ex gratia payment may be made when a member of the public has suffered measurable loss as a direct result of Departmental maladministration, but if the hon. Member has any particular case in mind perhaps he would write to me.

Abortions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1), pursuant to his reply of 2 July, Official Report, column 59, if he will make regulations under the Abortion Act 1967 to provide that in the case of an abortion performed between 24 and 28 weeks of pregnancy, the doctor who performs the abortion shall specifically certify all cases where the grounds for the abortion under section 1(1)(a) of the Act relate solely to the sex of the unborn child; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to render unlawful abortion on grounds which relate solely to the sex of the unborn child; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Abortion on grounds relating to the sex of the foetus is not provided for in the Abortion Act and is therefore already unlawful.

Private Patients (Sheffield)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to the number of private patients in the Sheffield area health authority who have changed status to National Health Service patients within one episode of treatment in the last three years;

(2) what was the cost to the Sheffield area health authority of private patients who have changed status to National Health Service patients within one episode of treatment in the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect centrally such detailed local information. The hon. Member may therefore wish to make inquiries of the chairman of Sheffield district health authority.

Waiting Lists (Sheffield)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the average National Health Service waiting lists in the Sheffield area health authority for the last three years for which figures are available in orthopaedics, gynaecology, general medicine, ear nose and throat, dermatology, general surgery, geriatrics and heart surgery.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is given in the table. In general, figures on waiting lists are believed to include a significant proportion of duplicated entries and patients who no longer require treatment. About half of all admissions to hospital are immediate and many of those on waiting lists already have a planned date of admission.

Nurses

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the average weekly pay of a student nurse in each of the three stages of training; and how this compares with each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 21 June at columns 255-256.

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospital beds and qualified nurses there are per head of population according to each health authority; and how this compares with each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as can be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost as soon as possible.

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average number of hours overtime worked per week by (a) a first year student nurse, (b) a second year student nurse and (c) a third year student nurse in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally.

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report as much information as is in his possession about the average hours of work of a student nurse according to each of the three stages of training; and how this compares with each of the last six years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 28 June at columns 530-531. We do not hold such information centrally.

Woodgrange Park House (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Tony Banks: asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the ministerial visit to his Department's office at Woodgrange Park House on 4 July.

Mr. Whitney: As part of a programme of visits by Ministers to local social security offices throughout the country, I went to the Woodgrange Park office on 4 July. I had useful discussions with many of the staff working in the office. I take this opportunity to record my appreciation of the dedication of these staff and of the staff of our other offices. I regret that because a minority of the staff decided to strike and join a demonstration outside the office, in which the hon. Member for Newham North West (Mr. Banks) also participated, the office was closed to the public until midday and claimants were inconvenienced. I spoke to the strikers at the end of my visit.

Mrs. Maria Shah

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Newham, North-West may expect to receive a reply to the letter sent to his Department on 14 November 1984 regarding the case of Mrs. Maria Shah.

Mr. Whitney: I shall ensure that the hon. Member receives an early reply and would refer him to the answers I gave him on 1 July at columns 60-61.

Broadmoor

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will take steps to prevent patients at Broadmoor from being allowed out on visits;

(2) why patients from Broadmoor were recently allowed to visit Windsor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Visits outside Broadmoor hospital and the other special hospitals are an important element in patient rehabilitation programmes. The visit to Windsor to which my hon. Friend refers took place in July 1984 without any complaint from anyone at the time. Decisions on patient outings or other visits are matters for the clinical judgment of responsible medical officers. In the case of restricted patients, absences from the hospital require the approval of my right hon. and learned Friend, the Home Secretary. Patients taking part in group outings are escorted continuously by nurses from the hospitals. I am quite satisfied that there is no unacceptable degree of risk to the public from such visits.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how long trusted patients are allowed to stay in Broadmoor on average before being transferred to ordinary psychiatric hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A research study of departures from the four special hospitals covering the years 1978 to 1982 showed the average length of stay of the patients who left in each of those years was:

	Years
1978	7·83
1979	7·48
1980	8·95
1981	8·19
1982	8·63

Steps will be taken to transfer a patient to another hospital as soon as it is agreed that he or she no longer requires the high level of security of a special hospital.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients were released from Broadmoor in each of the past five years; and whether any of them were recidivists.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The numbers of patients who left the hospital were as follows:

Broadmoor Hospital

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Transferred to NHS hospitals whilst still detained under the Mental Health Act	33	56	30	30	36
Discharged into the community	19	12	22	11	11
Returned to prison	4	1	6	6	3
TOTAL	56	69	58	47	50

If my hon. Friend has in mind criminal records prior to admission, I am not able to give the further information requested. While the majority of patients in special hospitals were sent there by court orders or on transfer from prison, about 20 per cent. of these patients were admitted from other hospitals solely on account of the severity of their mental disorder and not as a consequence of appearance before a court.

Mental Health Review Tribunals

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the working of the mental health review tribunals established under the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 1 July, Official Report, columns 45-46, how many households recorded in the annual statistics inquiry for December 1983 were having deductions made from their supplementary benefit for electricity and how many for gas in £1·00 bands above £12·00 per week.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible as far as deductions for electricity are concerned. Because of the sample size, a reliable breakdown cannot be made in bands over £12 per week of deduction for gas.

Diabetes

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision his Department is making for improving education on diabetes to patients and their families; and what advice he has given to regional health authorities on providing education programmes for diabetics.

Mr. John Patten: Clearly the education of diabetics about the condition and its implications is an important part of their treatment. It must be a matter for the doctor responsible for the patient to ensure that the patient is fully informed and trained to cope with this condition.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision his Department is making for promoting the screening of eyes of diabetics.

Mr. John Patten: There is growing acceptance within the Health Service of the importance of screening patients with diabetes for diabetic retinopathy, a major cause of visual handicap. The Department is funding a multicentre project to establish the most effective means of organising screening programmes.

Social Security Review

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will expand on the description of claimants who have no recent links with the United Kingdom given in paragraph 2.87 of Cmnd. 9518;

(2) whether the presence test mentioned in paragraph 2.87 of the Green Paper on "Reform of Social Security", Cmnd. 9518, will exclude claimants who have gone abroad for long periods to visit or care for relatives;

(3) whether the presence test mentioned in paragraph 2.87 of the Green Paper on "Reform of Social Security", Cmnd. 9518, will include a reference to a claimant's immigration status.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (Private Contractors)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received concerning the inclusion of Whitley council conditions of service and rates of pay in contracts between the National Health Service and private contractors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many current contracts between district health authorities and private contractors (a) include, and (b) exclude, Whitley council conditions of service and rates of pay.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are not aware how many health authorities have let contracts with such conditions included, but none should have done so. We have informed health authorities that it is quite wrong to try to interfere in this way in the relationship between a contractor and his employees. We do not approve of or support any attempt by a health authority to try to enforce such conditions.

Medicines (Ingredients)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to require drug manufacturers to specify each of the contents of proprietary medicines.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I assume the right hon. Member is referring to medicines purchased over the counter. Regulations already require the active ingredients to be stated on labels and leaflets. We are presently looking at the practicality of requiring some inactive ingredients—for example, colouring agents—to be declared where these are known to cause reactions in certain people.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to alter the housing benefit regulations that cover non householders over 18 years on youth training schemes to provide that housing benefit their parents receive is not reduced on the assumption that they are wage-earners.

Mr. Newton: Regulation 20(8) of the Housing Benefits Regulations 1985 provides that no deduction shall be made from housing benefit in respect of a non-dependant who is in receipt of a training allowance paid by the Manpower Services Commission in connection with a youth training scheme.

DEFENCE

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government have been consulted by the United States administration about planned future improvements in the range and capability of cruise missiles based in the United Kingdom ; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I understand from the United States authorities that no such improvements that are of material significance are currently planned.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if in the light of the recent United States House of Representatives decision on 20 June to authorise funds for offensive chemical weapons on condition that Britain agrees to store them, it remains his policy to oppose the storage of chemical weapons in Britain; and if he will make the position of Her Majesty's Government on this issue known to both the members of the United States Congress and to the United States administration.

Mr. Stanley: The position on the storage of United States chemical weapons in Britain is that no such request has been made to us, as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath on 26 March (Vol. 76, columns 180-1).

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any restrictions on civil liberties are envisaged in the exercise brave defender scenario; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The detailed exercise scenario is classified. However, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence stated on 21 March 1985 (Vol. 75, columns 585-6) Exercise Brave Defender will test the revised home defence plans described in paragraph 413 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984" (Cmnd. 9227).

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the most recent estimate of the cost of exercise brave defender; and if he will provide a breakdown.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 25 February 1985, at column 83. Approximately two thirds of the £3 million is attributable to additional manpower and associated costs, such as travel; the remainder covers additional logistic support.

Annual Awards

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to review the annual award to holders of, or widows of holders of, the Victoria Cross and George Cross; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: We have no plans at present to review the annuity associated with the Victoria Cross.

The George Cross is, of course, primarily intended for civilians, and questions relating to its associated pension are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Explosives and Ammunition

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence what measures are taken to ensure that the criteria governing the storage, processing and handling of conventional military explosives and ammunition are up to date.

Mr. Lee: The explosives storage and transport committee periodically reviews procedures for Ministry of Defence-owned munitions to ensure that they are in accordance with the best advice available in explosives safety. The latest of these reviews, in which the Health and Safety Executive is fully involved, has just started. An independent adviser, Mr. Bryan Harvey, has been appointed by my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces to whom he will be able to report directly on progress.

Soviet Weaponry

Sir Frederic Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the scope and nature of Soviet activities in the field of space weapons and ballistic missile defence.

Mr. Stanley: Soviet space and ballistic missile defence programmes are extensive and have been in existence since the 1960s, and only recently the Soviet Defence Minister has confirmed that the Russians are conducting outer space military research. They possess and are upgrading around Moscow the world's only system of active anti-ballistic missile defences, which employs nuclear-tipped missiles capable of destroying targets outside the atmosphere. They have an operational anti-satellite system. They are also conducting substantial programmes on advanced technologies relevant to ballistic missile defence, including high-powered lasers, kinetic energy and particle beam weapons, and heavy lift space launchers. In fact, since 1976 they have conducted more than twice as many launches as the rest of the world put together, about 80 per cent. of them military in nature. We are considering whether further information can be made available on the extent of Soviet ballistic missile defence activity. This subject is also dealt with in the United States Government's publication "Soviet Military Power: 1985," a copy of which is in the Library and with whose assessment on this subject we are generally in agreement.

Engagements

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state his official engagements for Monday 8 July.

Mr. Heseltine: In the morning I had meetings with the Indonesian Minister of Research and Technology, the United States Under Secretary of Defence Policy, ministerial colleagues and others, and I later attended a meeting with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the chiefs of staff. I had further meetings in the afternoon.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Teachers

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science by how much university teachers' salaries have fallen behind retail prices and average earnings since the comparability settlement which determined university teachers' salaries in October 1979.

Sir Keith Joseph: This "1979 comparability settlement" did not settle salaries "in October 1979". It was promulgated in August 1980 and the salary increases were paid in instalments in April and October 1980. By reference to the salary rates actually in operation on 1 October 1979, university teachers' salaries have matched the increase in the retail prices index and fallen behind the average earnings index by some 10 per cent.

University Lecturers and Professors (Salaries)

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what would now be the gross salary of (a) a university lecturer on the scale maximum and (b) a university professor on the professional average, if the salary obtaining in October 1979 had kept pace with subsequent movements in the retail price index.

Sir Keith Joseph: Between October 1979 and April 1984 the gross actual salaries in each case have kept up with movements in the retail prices index and would therefore be no different.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers have taken early retirement in the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: Under the Teachers Superannuation Regulations 1976 (as amended) the minimum retirement age is normally 60. Teachers may retire earlier on grounds of infirmity or, for those between age 50 and 60, if the employer certifies that the teacher's service has been terminated by reason of redundancy or in the interests of the efficient discharge of the employer's functions. The numbers of retirements below age 60 in each of the past five years are as follows:

	Infirmity	Other Premature	Total
1980-81	1,354	4,301	5,655
1981-82	1,509	6,341	7,850
1982-83	1,859	6,997	8,856
1983-84	2,068	7,409	9,477
1984-85	2,445	9,175	11,620

Russian Language

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many universities, polytechnics and colleges teach (a) Russian language and (b) Soviet studies; how many graduates and post-graduate students have qualified with degrees or diplomas in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement on his policy towards the future of Russian language and Soviet studies.

Mr. Brooke: Thirty universities in Great Britain and one polytechnic in England offer degree courses in Russian or Russian studies. Statistical returns to the Department do not make it possible to provide separate figures for courses with these titles; information about provision for these subjects in colleges of further education is not readily available; nor is it possible to provide figures for students successfully completing courses in this field leading to the Higher National Diploma. The numbers obtaining first and post-graduate degrees in Russian and Russian studies at universities and polytechnics in each of the last five years were as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Universities (Great Britain)
First Degrees	130	127	130	110	88	109
Higher Degrees*	33	14	23	25	22	26
Total	163	141	153	135	110	135
Polytechnics	5	6	8	10	8	5

The Government's general policy for higher education was presented in the Green Paper, "The Development of Higher Education into the 1990s" (Cmnd. 9524). The Paper does not deal specifically with provision for Russian or Russian studies but the Government acknowledge their potential value and believe that to maintain capacity for a full range of modern language teaching, including subjects which are a minority preference, will require continuing gains in efficiency, entailing further concentration of provision.

Foreign Languages

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to promote and support the teaching of foreign languages; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: Britain's membership of the European Community and her place as a trading nation make a strong capacity in foreign languages essential and the Government attaches importance to the teaching of such languages. We have announced our intention to issue later this year a statement of policy on foreign language teaching in schools in England and Wales.

We also attach importance to the support of foreign language teaching; and I therefore intend to continue to make available funding to the centre for information on language teaching and research for its work in this area. However, in the context of public expenditure restraint, I wish to ensure that CILT's grant — which stands at £386,551 in 1985-86 — is put to the best possible use and that the scope for possible savings is identified. I am therefore initiating — in association with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland, whose Departments also contribute to CILT's grant — a joint exploration with CILT and its clients of ways of improving value for money.

A copy of the consultative letter which is being issued today has been placed in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Tower Hamlets

Mr. Shore asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many industrial improvement areas have been scheduled under the Inner Urban Areas Act in the borough of Tower Hamlets; and what is the total of urban development grants made by him towards projects in those areas.

Sir George Young: Four. Urban development grant, involving public expenditure of up to £196,500, has been offered towards one project in one of these areas. Urban development grant is not limited to industrial improvement areas and other forms of assistance to firms are available, in particular under sections 5 and 6 of the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978, in such areas.

Tenders

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to allow local authorities to tender for contracts offered to Government Departments for items such as highway maintenance and buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Housing Programme (Birmingham)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the local discretionary element of the Birmingham city council housing investment programme in so far as the Housing Defects Act is concerned.

Mr. Gow: In deciding the local discretionary element of Birmingham's HIP allocation for 1985-86, many factors were taken into account including the Housing Defects Act 1984. It is not possible to attribute specific amounts to particular factors. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 13 March at column 348 that he would consider sympathetically applications for additional allocations from authorities which would have particular difficulty in meeting their obligations under the Act. I hope to make an announcement about that shortly.

Telecommunication Developments

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to amend the general development order to take account of telecommunication developments; and what safeguards for the environment will apply to such developments.

Mr. Macfarlane: The necessary orders, made by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State have been laid before Parliament today. The relevant orders consist of an amendment to the General Development Orders 1977-83, and a new special development order to deal with national parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty, conservation areas and the broads. An order made by the Secretary of State for Scotland amending the Scottish General Development Order 1981 in a similar manner has also been laid before Parliament today. These orders will come into operation on 1 November. I am advised that appropriate corresponding changes to Northern Ireland legislation are under consideration.

The general development order amendment provides for two new classes of permitted development. The first and more extensive concerns minor development by code operators — that is to say those persons operating a telecommunications system to whom the powers in the telecommunications code have been applied, by the telecommunications licences issued by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. These code operators will include companies who have been licensed to provide a national telecommunications system — British Telecom, Mercury, and the two national cellular radio companies — and a number of operators licensed to install local broadband cable television systems.

Much of the development associated with these systems is minor — much of the apparatus is underground — and it would be burdensome to impose full planning control in these circumstances. Class XXIV of the new GDO will therefore permit licensed code operators to install a wide variety of telecommunications apparatus under, on and over land, and on buildings, subject to various limits and conditions set out in that order. This apparatus includes wires, poles, ducts, telephone kiosks and equipment cabinets, small masts and certain antennae (including terrestrial microwave and satellite dishes), but excludes buildings.

Planning applications are not normally required for any development permitted by the various classes of the GDO. However, apart from the various limits set out in the GDO itself, the planning freedom represented by the GDO changes are qualified in their effect by the terms of each code operator's telecommunications licence, since every code licence contains conditions designed to help protect the physical environment and conserve the natural beauty and amenity of the countryside. For example, British Telecom's licence requires it to install its lines underground in conservation areas, with various specified exceptions; there are special arrangements for national parks and areas of outstanding natural beauty and in Scotland for the national scenic areas; and more generally British Telecom must take steps to ensure that all new lines other than service lines are installed underground where it is reasonable to do so. Each of the various individual system licences therefore provides essential environmental safeguards which will help ensure that the planning freedom given by the GDO is exercised responsibly, and that in many cases local planning authorities are formally consulted by the installer of the apparatus before development takes place in certain situations. The licence system allows these planning safeguards to be tailored to the type and method of installation of the telecommunications system concerned and to the nature of the area in question, after taking into account any views expressed by local planning authorities and others during the required statutory consultation period.

The other new Class of the GDO deals with certain apparatus installed by persons to whom no Code powers apply, but who nonetheless may be installing small antennae on larger buildings, either to establish a microwave transmission link to another site, or to receive signals from a telecommunications broadcasting satellite. Subject to limits on the size and number of the antennae, on the minimum height of the building and on the height which they add to the building concerned, we propose to extend permitted development status to these installations as well, under the new Order. However, the new special development order, which accompanies the GDO changes, disapplies the planning freedom to erect such antennae—in respect of both new GDO classes—in all the special areas to which it applies, namely the national parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty, conservation areas, and the Norfolk broads. In those areas, and in Scotland in the national scenic areas, the present requirement to make a specific planning application remains unaltered.

The special development order also has the effect of bringing into line with existing special areas any land which has been designated as a conservation area, AONB or national park in England and Wales since 1981, together with the broads. Quite apart from telecommunications matters, such newly designated areas will be subject to the narrower version of the rights to extend private houses and industrial buildings, in the same way as other such areas have been since 1981.

The various changes to the planning system in respect of telecommunications are intended to reflect the growth in telecommunications and changes in Government policy towards its regulation. We have taken considerable care following extensive public consultations to achieve both a reasonable degree of planning freedom for the benefits of telecommunications development while at the same time imposing effective and essential safeguards so that the surroundings in which we live are properly protected from visual damage.

Grant-Related Expenditure

Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the changes to local authorities' grant-related expenditure in the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1982-83.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I first laid this report before the House on 4 July. Since then it has come to light that the report did not incorporate a change to Dudley MBC's grant-related expenditure which my Department had agreed should be made so as to correct a form-filling error by the council. Accordingly I laid before the House yesterday the 1982-83 Report with the requisite changes in manuscript on pages 3, 8 and 28. The report is being re-printed. Copies of the substituted report will be sent to all local authorities.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) to whom the residuary body will be accountable; and whether there are any plans for a review of its expenditure by the Audit Commission;

(2) if the validity of proceedings of the London Residuary Body will be dependent on an established quorum.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1985]: The hon. Member will also find relevant information in paragraph 5 of schedule 13 to the Local Government Bill.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what arrangements exist for consultation between the London Docklands Development Corporation and the population in the London docklands area; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what efforts are made by the London Docklands Development Corporation to let the Docklands Forum know what its plans are; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his answer, 11 July 1985]: The Docklands Forum and local voluntary bodies are represented on a number of LDDC community liaison groups which consider project funding for voluntary organisations as well as more general issues affecting the local community. One of the most important roles of the corporation's three area offices in Tower Hamlets, Newham and Southwark is to provide accessible centres where local people can meet and question the development team for the area. There are also arrangements for consultation with local people on specific planning issues.

The Docklands Forum, which receives revenue funding from the corporation, meets the LDDC regularly at chairman level to review its community liaison arrangements. In addition a number of joint LDDC/ Docklands Forum committees have been formed to look into specific topics.

TRANSPORT

Gravesend-Tilbury Ferry

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he sought or received any assurances regarding the future of the Gravesend-Tilbury ferry service prior to the privatisation of Sealink UK Ltd.

Mr. David Mitchell: In its information memorandum issued prior to the privatisation of Sealink UK Ltd., the British Railways Board told potential purchasers that the company's ferry service between Gravesend and Tilbury is a common law franchise ferry service and the company is therefore obliged to maintain its operation.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trade Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which European Economic Community countries have increased their share of world trade in manufactured goods since 1972.

Mr. Channon: In 1983, the latest year for which figures are available, Ireland and Greece had higher shares of the exports of manufactures by all countries (excluding the centrally planned economies) than in 1972.

"Made in Britain"

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received regarding the accuracy of descriptions relating to "Made in Britain" in the light of campaigns to buy British.

Mr. Fletcher: None that can be identified as such, although I do from time to time receive suggestions for changes in the definition of origin in Section 36 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968.

House of Fraser

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the sources from which he obtained information, other than from Kleinwort Benson or the Al Fayeds, upon which to base his decision not to refer the takeover bid by Al Fayed to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Fletcher: No. Such information is confidential.

Alpha Steel Works, Newport

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has had any recent discussions with the chairman of the British Steel Corporation concerning the future of the Alpha steel works in Newport, Gwent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is not normal to comment on any discussions that may have taken place concerning any private sector company.

Crossbows

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to ban the importation of crossbows; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The misuse of these articles is adequately covered by existing criminal legislation, so I do not think that there is any reason to impose such a ban.

Bubble Gum Sweets

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about imports of aluminium-coated bubble gum sweets.

Mr. Channon: Aluminium-coated bubble gum sweets are not separately distinguished in the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics.

Motor Vehicles

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list his powers to require car manufacturers to state the British value added percentage in each marque in their product range.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: Section 8 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 provides powers to require that goods should be marked with or accompanied by prescribed information relating to the goods, where such information appears necessary or expedient in the interest of persons to whom any goods are supplied. Section 9 of the Act provides corresponding powers in respect of advertisements for goods. The use of these powers is subject to prior consultation with those whose interests are likely to be affected, and to the constraints of the Government's international obligations.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of motor car, lorry and bus exports to the European Economic Community, respectively, including Portugal and Spain, over the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available; what were the comparable figures in each of the previous five years; and what were the comparable figures for imports of cars, lorries and buses, respectively, from the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon: [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: The available information is as follows:

Value £ million

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	May 1984-April 1985
Complete passenger motor cars:

Notes:
(i) 1984 figures are provisional.
(ii) UK exports are valued fob, imports are valued cif.
(iii) All figures relate to the European Community as currently constituted, plus Spain and Portugal.

NATIONAL FINANCE

General Betting Duty

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the yield from the general betting duty in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: The yield from general betting duty in 1984-85 was £293 million.

Black Economy

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will initiate studies of recent estimates of the size of the black economy and the correlation between the level of unemployed claimants and registrants at jobcentres, with a view to instituting subsequently an inquiry into the size of the black economy and ways to restrict it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Brussels Meeting

Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the meeting of the European Community Economic and Finance Council in Brussels on 8 July.

Mr. Lawson: I represented the United Kingdom at this Council.

In accordance with the new arrangements for budget discipline, the council reached an agreement by qualified majority to fix the reference framework for 1986 at 29·7 billion ecu (about £17 billion). The European Parliament will be invited to give its views before the reference framework is formally adopted. Detailed consideration of the financing of Community policies will then proceed in the Budget Council which will also have before it fuller information in particular on the impact of inlargement.

The Council also reviewed the economic situation in the Community. It decided there was no need to change the policy guidelines agreed in December 1984. It took note of the budget guidelines issued to individual member states.

Ministers also discussed tax measures to encourage co-operation between undertakings in different member states. This subject will be considered further at the October Council. It was agreed that the 20th VAT directive which concerns special national aid for German farmers should now be adopted as an A point at a forthcoming Council.

While there are a number of technical issues to be resolved before the directive on emissions from engines of motor vehicles can be adopted, the United Kingdom was able to lift the ad referendum reserve on the agreement on standards for vehicle emissions reached at the Environment Council on 27-28 June.

EC (Loans)

Mr. William Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what sums have been paid by the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community in interest charges on sums on loan to the United Kingdom from the European Economic Community in each year or financial year since 1 January 1973 to the latest convenient date;

(2) what sums have been repaid of the capital sums lent to the United Kingdom by the European Economic Community in each year from 1 January 1973 to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his replies, 10 July 1985]: Information on interest payments and capital repayments in respect of borrowing from the EEC by the United Kingdom public sector can be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information in respect of private sector transactions is in any case incomplete. I therefore regret that I am unable to supply the information requested.

WALES

Day Care Places

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many day care places are currently available in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 5,431 at 31 March 1984, the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the proportion of day care places to the number of people over the age of 75 years in Wales for each of the years 1978 to 1985 inclusive.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is given below:

*Year	Number of day care places		Total	Rate per thousand population aged 75+
	in day centres for the elderly	in LA residential homes for the elderly
1978	2,631	286	2,917	19·6
1979	2,585	263	2,848	18·6
1980	2,649	317	2,966	19·1
1981	2,697	307	3,004	18·9
1982	2,660	371	3,031	18·1
1983	2,328	412	2,740	15·9
1984	2,295	269	2,564	14·5

* as at 31 March

Housing Repairs

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to the proportion of homes in Wales in need of repairs exceeding £7,000 in cost, currently occupied by (a) pensioners, (b) unemployed persons, (c) single parent familes and (d) people with total annual incomes of £7,000 or less.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The 1981 "Welsh House Condition Survey" identified the proportion of homes which were in need of repairs over £7,000 and which were occupied by pensioners and unemployed persons as 2·6 per cent. and 0·4 per cent. respectively. No information is available in respect of single parent families or persons whose incomes were below £7,000.

Doctors' Lists

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total number of Welsh people registered with a general practitioner at the latest convenient date; and what proportion of the population this represented.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At 1 April 1985, the number of patients registered on general practitioner lists held by the eight family practitioner committees in Wales totalled 2,902,800. This was 3·4 per cent. more than the estimated population of Wales, the excess being primarily due to the dual registration of patients who are tranferring between doctors, and are temporarily included on both lists.

Skillcentres

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to visit the West Gwent skill training centre and the Llanelli skill training centre.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: None at present. I shall maintain my close interest in the Manpower Services Commission's plans to develop and expand training provision in the areas served by these skillcentres.

School Leavers

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of school leavers in Wales since Easter 1985 inclusive.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Information on the characteristics of school leavers in the school year 1984-85, including information on the dates of departure, is not currently available. However, the number of school leavers over the whole year is provisionally estimated to be about 44,000. Of these, about 3 per cent. are estimated to have left in the autumn term, about 9 per cent. in the spring term with the remaining 88 per cent. leaving in the summer term.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the current number of unemployed school leavers who have completed a youth training scheme course.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Manpower Services Commission does not have such information currently available.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much extra money will be made available in the current financial year for the two-year youth training scheme course in Wales in the financial year 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment announced on 1 July, the expanded scheme will be introduced from 1 April 1986. Some £125 million extra money will be made available on a Great Britain basis in 1986-87 and some £300 million extra in 1987-88. Detailed allocations will depend on the distribution of places by the Manpower Services Commission with advice from area manpower boards, taking account of need. Employers will also be contributing to the costs of the expanded scheme.

Training

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many mode B training schemes there are for the current 1984-85 year; how many there were in 1983-84; and how many are proposed for 1985-86.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Provision of mode B places is based on assessments made by area manpower boards taking account of expected need. One hundred mode B schemes have been approved in Wales for 1985-86 and at 31 May there were 5,019 young people in training on these schemes. In 1984-85 6,002 young people were trained on 102 mode B schemes. Comparative figures for 1983-84 were 6,190 trainees and 104 schemes.

Hospitals Beds

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, for each of the years 1973 to 1984, he will provide such information as is available as to the number of hospital beds in each Welsh health authority region which were (a) closed as a result of complete hospital closure, (b) closed in hospitals which were not completely closed, (c) provided as a result of new hospital openings and (d) provided as a result of additions to existing hospitals.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

NORTHERN IRELAND

School Meals

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many school meals are provided daily in Northern Ireland; how many of them are provided free; how many school meals are provided in Northern Ireland per area board, per primary school and per secondary school; how many free school meals are provided per area board, per primary school and per secondary school; and if he will make a statement on the effect of the proposed changes in social security legislation on the provision of free school meals.

Mr. Scott: The available information is as follows (based on a day in October 1984).

	Belfast board area	Southern board area	North Eastern board area	South Eastern board area	Western board area	North Ireland
Primary schools
Meals provided	15,052	24,532	18,603	12,738	23,820	94,745
Free meals	9,742	14,246	10,438	5,980	15,056	55,462
Secondary schools
Meals provided	12,056	16,024	14,403	8,135	15,733	66,351

	Belfast board area	Southern board area	North Eastern board area	South Eastern board area	Western board area	North Ireland
Free meals	7,172	9,308	8,237	3,744	10,051	38,512
Total meals provided	27,108	40,556	33,006	20,873	39,553	161,096
Total free meals	16,914	23,554	18,675	9,724	25,107	93,974

The Green Paper on Social Security Reform proposes to replace supplementary benefit with income support and recipients of this new benefit would continue to be entitled to free school meals for their children. It is also proposed that family income supplement be replaced by family credit and the rates of such credit will be enhanced to provide extra cash instead of entitlement to free school meals.

Women Prisoners (Armagh)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many women prisoners were held on remand at Armagh prison in each of the following months: March 1985, April 1985, May 1985 and June 1985.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

Women on Remand or awaiting trial March to June 1985

	Numbers
March	13
April	11
May	9
June	6

The above figures, which relate to the last Sunday in each month, include those detained in the young offenders centre.

Armagh Prison (Strip Searches)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, in June; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being conducted; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely, making an appearance at Armagh courthouse on remand, attending trial, inter-prison vist or other reasons.

Mr. Scott: During June 1985, a total of 53 searches were carried out on 21 prisoners; eight prisoners were searched once; nine were searched twice; three were searched three times; and a life sentence prisoner taking part in a pre-release programme was searched on 18 occasions. The latter prisoner was offered accommodation in a separate, self-contained unit of the prison, which would have obviated the need for the full reception search procedure, but she preferred to remain located with the other prisoners.

A quantity of tranquilliser tablets were found in the clothing of an inmate during a routine committal search. No prisoner refused to be searched.

Searches were carried out in the following circumstances:

	Numbers
First Admission on Remand and Awaiting Trial	4
First Admission on Sentence and Final Discharge	10
Attending Remand Courts (other than Armagh)	1
Attending Trial	2
Bail Court Appearances	3
Pre-release Programme	14
Home Leave Scheme	13
Compassionate Home Leave	6
Total	53

Maternity Units

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement on the future of the maternity unit in Strabane;

(2) if he will make a statement on the future of the maternity unit in Limavady.

Mr. Chris Patten: The provision of services at these two hospitals is a matter for the Western health and social services board in the first instance. I understand, however, that the board is in fact reviewing the future of the small general practitioner maternity units at both hospitals in the light of the current policy for obstetric services. No decisions have yet been made about the future of the units and no changes will be made without widespread consultations.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current level of unemployment in Strabane; and what measures he proposes to take to seek to reduce it.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Pensioners

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current number of pensioners in Northern Ireland by sex and by five-year age groups.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how many pensioners live alone, live with spouses, live with other relatives or are in residential care or sheltered accommodation, respectively.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the form requested. The available information as at 31 December 1983 is as follows:

	Male	Female
(i) Persons Accommodated in Old People's Homes	921	2,347
(ii) Persons Accommodated in Voluntary and Private Old People's Homes	*290	*878
Total	1,211	3,225
Grand Total	4,436

* Incomplete returns from the Eastern and Western Boards Areas.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the numbers of pensioners in receipt of housing benefit, detailing how many of those are also in receipt of supplementary benefit, broken down by convenient district unit.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the form requested. The estimated total number of pensioners receiving housing benefit on 15 March 1985 was 84,000, including some 49,400 on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many pensioners in Northern Ireland receive reduced pensions because they are in receipt of private pensions or other incomes.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how many persons are (a) Housing Executive tenants, (b) living with Housing Executive tenants, (c) private tenants and (d) owner occupiers, respectively.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive but I understand from the chairman that the available information is as follows:

(a) 175,602 as at 31 March 1985.
(b) Up-to-date information is not available.
(c) Approximately 37,000 in 1984.
(d) Approximately 256,700 in 1984.

SCOTLAND

Assistance to Newspapers

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much financial assistance the Highlands and Islands Development Board has provided from public funds in support of newspapers; and if he will list the newspapers and the amounts involved in each case.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Legal Aid

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the average contribution payable by an applicant for civil legal aid in Scotland in the latest year for which figures are available and for the preceding three years.

Mr. Younger: The information is not available in the form requested. However the following table illustrates the contributions payable by assisted persons in the range of nil to over £250 in the Court of Session and the sheriff courts.

Percentage analysis of Contributions Payable

Year	Nil	£1-£50	£51-£00	£101-£50	Over £250
1980-81
Court of Session	70	9	5	9	7
Sheriff courts	80	7	3	6	4
1981-82
Court of Session	70	9	5	7	9
Sheriff courts	80	7	3	6	4
1982-83
Court of Session	76	5	3	8	8
Sheriff courts	85	4	2	5	4
1983-84
Court of Session	88	2	2	4	4
Sheriff courts	92	1	1	3	3

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total cost of legal aid in Scotland for the year to 31 March and for each of the three preceding years, together with the percentage increase in each year and the total number of cases dealt with under legal aid in the same years, both in total and percentage terms.

Mr. Younger: Details for the year to 31 March 1985 are not yet available. The information for the three preceding years is as follows:

Year	Total net cost of legal aid (excluding administration) £000	Per cent. increase in year Percentage	Total no. of cases for which accounts were paid	Per cent. difference in year Percentage
1981-82	18,767	40	110,490	+30
1982-83	26,893	43	120,393	+9
1983-84	29,118	8	112,951	−6

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the present upper disposable income limit above which an applicant is ineligible for legal aid in civil proceedings in Scotland, together with the lower income limit below which no contribution is payable and the upper capital limit; and if he will list the variations in these figures over the last three years.

Mr. Younger: The limits and the dates on which they came into operation are as follows:

	26 November 1984 £	29 November 1983 £	1 April 1983 £	1 April 1982 £
Upper disposable income limit	5,155	4,925	4,720	4,440
Lower disposable income limit	2,145	2,050	1,965	1,850
Upper capital limit	4,710	4,500	4,000	2,725

Legal Advice and Assistance

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total cost of legal advice and assistance in Scotland for the year to 31 March, together with the comparable figures for the last three years and the average cost for each application in each of these years.

Mr. Younger: Details for the year to 31 March 1985 are not yet available. The information for the three preceding years is as follows:

	Total cost of legal advice and assistance (excluding administration) £000	Total no. of cases for which accounts were paid	Average cost per case £
1981-82	2,478	58,421	42·42
1982-83	2,706	60,136	45·00
1983-84	3,845	86,140	44·64

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of applications for legal advice and assistance in Scotland in the years 31 March 1983 to 31 March 1984, and 31 March 1984 to 31 March 1985, respectively; in what percentage of cases the applicant had no contribution to pay; how many applications were made for authority to incur expenditure in excess of the initial limit; and how many such applications were granted, both in numbers and as a percentage of all legal advice and assistance cases.

Mr. Younger: Details for the year to 31 March 1985 are not yet available. In 1983-84, 131,173 applications were approved. In 39,890 cases an application was made for authority to incur expenditure in excess of the initial limit and 37,352 were granted, 28 per cent. of all applications approved.

In 90 per cent. of the 86,140 cases in which separate accounts for legal advice and assistance were paid in 1983-84 the client had no contribution to pay.

ENERGY

Wave Energy

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish the report, presented to Energy Technology Supply Unit last January by Dr. Peter White of Lanchester Polytechic, on the cost estimates of wave energy.

Mr. David Hunt: Copies of Dr. White's report have been placed in he Libraries of the Houses of Parliament, and are also available on request from the energy technology support unit at Harwell.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the average burn up, in MWd/te, of the spent fuel discharged from each of the Central Electricity Generating Board's Magnox reactors for the fiscal year 1982-83.

Mr. Goodlad: The expected average burnup corresponding to Magnox fuel cycles in 1982-83 was published in the supplement to the August 1983 edition of Nuclear Engineering International. I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave on 5 July 1985 at column 308.

PRIME MINISTER

Sports Stadiums (Safety)

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will allocate additional public funds to meet the cost of improving safety at sports stadiums such as greyhound race tracks.

The Prime Minister: Considerations of funding safety improvements at sports stadiums are being taken forward in the Minister with responsibility for sport's working group, which I established after the Bradford fire. It is too early to say what conclusions will be reached; information is awaited from the Chief Fire Officer's inspections and Mr. Justice Popplewell's inquiry.

GCHQ Cheltenham

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will refrain from taking any action regarding transfer of staff from the Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham, until such time as a judgment has been forthcoming from the European Commission on Human Rights.

The Prime Minister: No. The judgment of the House of Lords on 22 November 1984 completed the domestic legal process and confirmed that the revised terms and conditions of service introduced at the Government communications headquarters last year are valid. Those conditions of service are now in force and staff who do not wish to accept them will, in accordance with the notice issued on 25 January 1984, be offered alternative employment in the Home Civil Service or, if this is not available, premature retirement on redundancy terms.

Steel Industry

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Prime Minister (1) to what extent Her Majesty's Government propose to take account of the advice of the management of the British Steel Corporation in taking a decision about the future of the steel industry; and if she will make a statement;

(2) if she will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government not to take any decision on the future of the steel industry until the British Steel Corporation's corporate plan has been considered by Ministers; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government will take full account of BSC management's views in taking any decisions on the future of the steel industry. The Corporation's views are not exclusively embodied in corporate plans.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Terms of Transfer

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the terms of transfer offered to employees of the Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham, by Mr. Albert Nicholls of the Whitehall staff transfer unit.

Mr. Renton: A general notice (GN 100/84) issued to all staff at GCHQ, explained that for staff electing to leave GCHQ, the Department would try to arrange a level transfer within the Home Civil Service and the normal rules relating to reimbursement of expenses on transfer would apply.

National Identity Cards

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which member countries of the EEC at present have a system of national identity cards; and if he will publish in the Official Report a list of these countries and the year in which they first adopted an identity card system.

Mr. Renton: National identity cards are in use in Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Italy and Luxembourg. Information as to the date from which national identity cards were first adopted in these countries is not readily available. I will however obtain it and write to the hon. Member.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present number of ethnic minority members of the Metropolitan police and the rank that they hold.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 30 June 1985 there were 269 officers from the ethnic minorities in the Metropolitan police: two inspectors, 26 sergeants and 241 constables.

Prisons

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he plans to make use of military establishments to house convicted prisoners after the total prison population exceeds 48,000.

Mr. Mellor: No. But the Department has contingency plans for various circumstances and the possible use of service camps features in them.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those prisons in the United Kingdom which have been visited by members of the staff of the Chief Inspector of Prisons; and if he will place a copy of each report that has been published in the Library.

Mr. Mellor: All but 10 establishments in England and Wales have been visited, 67 for the purpose of a full inspection. The 10 exceptions, the first seven of which will be inspected during 1985, are:

Her Majesty's Prison
Ashwell
Kingston
Winchester
Wayland

Her Majesty's Detention Centre
Blantyre House
Gringley
Medomsley

Her Majesty's Youth Correction Centre
Hatfield
Castington
Deerbolt

Inspection reports are placed in the Library at the time of publication.

Mr. Ed Kale

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Mr. Ed Kale was permitted to re-enter the United Kingdom in 1985.

Mr. Waddington: A person is admitted to the United Kingdom if he qualifies for entry under the immigration rules.

Terrorism

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will institute an index or register of known terrorist groups and individuals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: Careful arrangements are made to ensure that information about known terrorist groups and known terrorists is available to those who need to know it, including, where appropriate, foreign Governments with whom we are co-operating in the fight against international terrorism.

Crossbows

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to ban the sale of crossbows; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so. Crossbows and other weapons not subject to specific controls are already covered, so far as misuse of them is concerned, by existing provisions of the law.

Prison Officers' Association

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the officers of the Prison Officers' Association; what subjects were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend last met officers of the Prison Officers' Association on 21 May when he addressed their annual conference. A copy of the text of his speech is in the Library. Before that, he met representatives of the Associations' National Executive Committee on 7 May.

Rule 43

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of prisoners who have been subject to rule 43 for over one year, two years, three years, four years and five years, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The number of sentenced prisoners in England and Wales who were segregated under prison rule 43 for their own protection or for reasons of good order or discipline for the periods in question (as at 31 January 1985, the latest date for which figures are available) was as follows:

	Own protection	Good order or discipline
1-2 years	22	4
2-3 years	5	—
3-4 years	3	—
4-5 years	—	—
Over 5 years	—	1

No women have been subject to rule 43 for longer than 1 year. Information is not kept centrally on the segregation of unconvicted prisoners.

Electoral Register (Advertising)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what publicity he intends to fund, in the way of advertising in national or local newspapers, in respect of the compilation of the electoral register for 1986-87.

Mr. Mellor: A publicity campaign will be mounted later this year to coincide with the annual canvass for the 1986 electoral register. Advertisements will appear in the national and ethnic press and on independent local radio stations throughout the country. These will emphasise the need for all those eligible to ensure that their names are included in the electoral registration return, form A, so that they do not lose the right to vote at any elections held during the life of the 1986 register.

Cable Broadcasting (Listed Events)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet drawn up a list of events for the purposes of section 14 of the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: After consultation with the broadcasters, the cable interests and the Sports Council, I have drawn up the following list for the purposes of section 14:

The Commonwealth Games when held in the United Kingdom
Cricket Test Matches involving England
The Derby horse race
The FIFA World Cup Finals
The Football Association Cup Final
The Grand National horse race
The Olympic Games
The Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race
The Wimbledon Tennis Championships

Additionally in Scotland, the Scottish Football Association Cup Final

This list follows closely that previously maintained by the broadcasters in relation to those events for which exclusive rights have by agreement not been sought in the past. The only additions are the inclusion of the FIFA world cup finals and the qualification "involving England" in relation to cricket test matches.

Prison Employment

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans for changing the pattern of employment for prison inmates.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison workshops it is planned to close in the next year and next two years; and what are the estimated savings in cost and staff.

Mr. Brittan: Following my announcement to the House on 31 October 1984 about the control, management and policies of prison service industries and farms at column 987, I asked the Prisons Board to examine how far prison industries are making a satisfactory contribution to providing worthwhile employment for prison inmates. The Prisons Board found that in many cases resources could be deployed to better effect. A considerable number of workshops had ceased to provide sufficient employment to be worth retaining; a small number no longer had a market for the goods they produced; others had more staff than justified by the present number of inmates employed.

In the light of the Prisons Board's preliminary analysis, I have asked the prison department to examine on the ground how the present network of industrial workshops could be rationalised, while retaining the existing level of work and related activity for inmates. When I am satisfied that arrangements for alternative worthwhile activity have been made the process of rationalisation will be implemented. Staff will be redeployed in a more effective way wherever possible, both within existing establishments and in some cases at the new prison establishments under construction which will provide some 1,800 new industrial work places for inmates and will require around 130 additional staff to man the workshops.

The workshops under review are open on average for only about 11 hours a week, and in many cases provide only simple and repetitive tasks with few training or learning opportunities for inmates. The review offers the opportunity to deploy the considerable resources voted by Parliament to better effect, while ensuring that inmates are occupied on purposeful activity outside their cells for no less time than at present.

This review does not apply to workshops in dispersal prisons, which have been under separate examination. Every opportunity is being taken to promote their more effective use.

A copy of a detailed statement by the Director General of the Prison Service explaining to staff the nature and purpose of the review has been placed in the Library.

Prison Workshops

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of prison workshops that are at the present time fully working at each of the prisons in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor: Two hundred and ninety-four workshops were in operation in prison establishments in England and Wales for all or part of the working week ended 26 May 1985, the most recent date for which information is available.

Dog Fouling

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is in a position to announce details of the pilot scheme to test new byelaws to reduce the nuisance of dog fouling.

Mr. Mellor: The details of the scheme have now been settled. The new byelaws will make it an offence for a person in charge of a dog to fail, without reasonable excuse, to remove any faeces deposited by the dog on designated footpaths, grass verges and recreation grounds. The penalty will be a fine of up to £100. Registered blind persons will be exempt from the byelaws. Four local authorities have been selected to take part in the scheme. Rochester upon Medway city council, Gosport borough council and the London borough of Barking and Dagenham have recently adopted byelaws for this purpose and North-West Leicestershire district council is in the process of doing so. Subject to considering any objections which may be received from the public my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary proposes to confirm these byelaws and they will come into operation on Monday 2 September 1985. In conjunction with the local authorities concerned the Home Office will then carefully monitor the project for 12 months and if, as we hope, the byelaws prove effective we intend to offer them as models for adoption by other local authorities.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Neonatal Nurses

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to remedy the shortage of trained neonatal nurses.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is for health authorities to decide, in the light of local needs and priorities and the resources available to them, how many nurses and midwives they should employ who have received training in the special and intensive care of the newborn and how many trainees they should recruit to meet those needs.

Limited List Prescribing

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress he has made in setting up a committee to keep the selected list of drugs under review.

Mr. Fowler: Before the selected list of NHS drugs was introduced last April, I made clear that we would want to keep the contents of the list under regular professional review. The new advisory committee on NHS drugs, which we are today establishing, will help us to do that. The committee has been set up following consultation with the main professional bodies concerned and with the pharmaceutical industry. It contains many of the people who advised on the original selected list but it has been extended to include members from Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland and from some other branches of the professions suggested to us.

Its terms of reference are

"To advise the United Kingdom Health Ministers about the composition of Schedules 3A and 3B to the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Regulations 1974, and the corresponding schedules in the Regulations in Scotland and Northern Ireland (except those items which are in Schedule 3A because the Advisory Committee on Borderline Substances has advised that they are not considered drugs in the circumstances of general practice) in order that drugs to meet all real clinical needs at the lowest possible cost to the National Health Service are available under the National Health Service in the following categories: mild to moderate painkillers, indigestion remedies, laxatives, cough and cold remedies, vitamins, tonics and benzodiazepine sedatives and tranquillisers."

Its membership comprises:

Chairman

Dr. Edmund Harris, Deputy Chief Medical Officer, Department of Health and Social Security.

Hospital Consultants

Mr. Norman Badham, Consultant ENT Surgeon, Leicester Royal Infirmary.

Professor Alasdair Breckenridge, Professor of Clinical Pharmacology, Liverpool.

Dr. Duncan Colin Jones, Consultant Physician (Gastroenterology), Portsmouth.

Professor Malcolm Hodkinson, Professor of Geriatric Medicine, London.

Professor Eric Stroud, Professor of Child Health, London.

Professor Malcolm Lader, Professor of Psychopharmacology, London.

Dr. James Moore, Consultant Anaesthetist, Belfast.

General Practitioners

Dr. John Callander, General Practitioner, Scotland.

Dr. Stuart Carne, General Practitioner, London.

Dr. John Lynch, General Practitioner, North Wales.

Dr. David Smith, General Practitioner, Northallerton.

Pharmacists

Dr. David Ganderton, Professor of Pharmaceutics (designate), King's College, London.

Mr. David Coleman, Retail Pharmacist, Norwich.

Dentist

Professor Roderick Cawson, Head of Oral Medicine and Pathology, Guy's Hospital, London.

The Committee will have an important part to play in ensuring that the selected list is kept up to date—by considering new drugs which become available and whether those on the list still represent the best value for money—and in dealing with any concerns which arise about the operating of the list itself. The Committee will have its first meeting on 23 July and among its first priorities will be to look at products, such as mucolytics, on which representations have already been made.

I am grateful to those who have agreed to serve on the Committee for their help in this important task.

Nurses

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a breakdown of the present average wage of a student nurse according to each of the three stages of training, such information including basic pay and overtime payments.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally.

Feverfew

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has studied the work being carried out at the City hospital, Nottingham, into the therapeutic properties of the herb, feverfew; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes, we have seen the report of this work in The Lancet of 11 May 1985. We welcome any steps taken in the scientific study of the effects of herbal products.

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that the manufacture of the herb feverfew will not be restricted as part of his Department's review under schedule 4 of statutory instrument No. 41 of 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There are no feverfew medicinal products subject to review under the Medicines Act. If we received and granted an application for a new product licence, the claims made in promotional literature would have to be consistent with the terms of the product lience. Any restrictions in a licence on advertising would depend on the claims made for the product and the data submitted in support of those claims.

Board and Lodging

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of alleged hardship have been brought to his Department's attention involving young people in the Huyton and Prescot area as a result of the new board and lodging rules.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that the local offices concerned have received some enquiries about the exemption categories and one appeal against a determination made under the new rules.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average reported delay in the transfer of relevant papers between benefit offices dealing with the claims of young people under the board and lodging rules.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. We are not aware of any serious delays but if the hon. Member has any particular case in mind perhaps he would let me know.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average payment and average length of time for which benefit is claimed under the board and lodging rules in the Huyton and Prescot area.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases have been brought to his Department's attention, both nationally and in the Huyton and Prescot area, of young people awaiting payment under the new board and lodging rules for over a month.

Mr. Whitney: We are not aware of any such cases.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases have been brought to his Department's attention, since the introduction of the new board and lodging rules, of young people being ruled ineligible for single payments for furniture both nationally and in the Huyton and Prescot office; and if he will list the various reasons given.

Mr. Whitney: No information is collected locally or nationally on the reasons for refusal of any type of single payment. We are not aware of any case brought to the attention of the Department where, as a consequence of the introduction of the new board and lodging rules, a young person has been ruled ineligible for a single payment for furniture.

Single Payments

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the policy of his Department regarding single payments for furniture to young people who obtain tenancies of unfurnished accommodation.

Mr. Whitney: Our policy on single payments for furniture to young people who obtain tenancies of unfurnished accommodation has regard, among other factors, to how recently the claimant has become a tenant, the reasons for leaving the previous address, the health of the claimant and any dependants, the length of time the claimant has been in receipt of supplementary benefit and the availability of suitable alternative furnished accommodation.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what circumstances a local office of his Department may stop the payment of invalidity benefit to a claimant.

Mr. Whitney: Questions about entitlement to social security benefits are for determination by the independent adjudication officers appointed under the Social Security Act 1975.

Entitlement to invalidity benefit may cease or be suspended for the following reasons: medical evidence that the claimant is no longer incapable of work; the award of an overlapping social security benefit; late claim to benefit; permanent absence abroad; earnings above the therapeutic earnings limit; imprisonment or detention in legal custody; incapacity due to the claimant's own misconduct; failure to attend or submit to examination or treatment; failure to observe the prescribed rules of behaviour during the period for which benefit is claimed; death of the claimant.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on how many occasions in the past year the Huyton and Prescot office of his Department has stopped the payment of invalidity benefit to claimants; and if he will list the reasons involved.

Mr. Whitney: I regret the information is not available. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number occasions on which payments of invalidity benefit to claimants have been stopped in the past year.

Mr. Whitney: In the 12 months up to 2 April 1983, the latest period for which figures are available, about 250,000 spells of invalidity benefit ended. Information on the reasons for termination is not available but the great majority will be because the claimant submitted a final doctor's statement certifying he was no longer incapable of work.

Child Benefit

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the statement of the Minister for Social Security on 18 June, Official Report, column 162, that child benefit will continue to be paid to the mother; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We are not aware of any repesentations following my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) on this subject on 18 June at column 162.

Private Medicine

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what circumstances a general practitioner may, on the advice of a consultant, prescribe medicines on the National Health Service to a patient on the general practitioner's list who has seen the consultant privately; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A general medical practitioner may issue a National Health Service prescription to a patient on his list for any drug which he believes to be clinically necessary and which is available under the National Health Service.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether, barring exceptional circumstances, a patient may have a private consultation, followed by free access to National Health Service diagnosis, followed by further private consultations or treatment, in the same medical episode;

(2) in what cirumstances a patient is permitted to transfer from private to National Health Service status for financial reasons;

(3) in what circumstances a patient who undergoes a private operation may receive subsequent treatment or care, in the same medical episode, as a National Health Service patient using National Health Service hospital facilities;

(4) in what circumstances a patient admitted to a National Health Service hospital following deterioration in a private hospital is admitted other than as a private patient, where the National Health Service hospital has private inpatient authorisations and where any quota of pay-beds would not be exceeded thereby.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our existing guidance to health authorities in part II of HC(82) 7 states, with respect to resident patients:

"Patients who enter hospital as private resident patients should not later be allowed to transfer to NHS status except in very exceptional circumstances where the administrator and clinician responsible agree there is evidence of a significant and unforeseen change in circumstances, for example where a patient entering for a minor operation is found to be suffering from a different, more serious complaint."

and, with respect to non-resident patients:

"Once a patient elects to attend an NHS hospital as a private non-resident patient for a particular medical episode then all services (diagnostic and treatment) used by that patient during that out-patient sequence should be provided on a private patient basis with the appropriate charges being levied. Should exceptionally such a patient, eligible for NHS services, wish to discontinue as a private patient, after consultation then the charge for consultation should be levied and he should seek access to NHS out-patient facilities as an NHS patient in the usual way."

There has nevertheless been some confusion about the circumstances in which private patients may change their status to that of National Health Service patients, and we intend to issue revised and consolidated guidance which clarifies this and other aspects of the management of private practice.

Medical Episode

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether his Department defines as a single medical episode a patient's pregnancy, including any tests or treatment arising therefrom, and also her subsequent childbirth;

(2) whether his Department defines a medical episode as including all consultation, diagnosis and treatment during a patient's illness;

(3) whether his Department defines a medical episode as including (a) foreseeable complications and (b) unforeseeable complications following treatment, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There is at present no formal definition of a medical episode. For statistical purposes, inpatients are counted on discharge from a hospital. Inpatient discharges (including deaths) are normally referred to as inpatient cases and each case covers the continuous stay by a patient in one hospital. The health services information group has recommended in its first report that information about specialty activity should be in terms of consultant episodes and not hospital stays. The group defines a consultant episode as the time a patient spends continuously in the care of one consultant in the same district health authority while occupying a hospital bed. We have asked health authorities to plan on the basis that the recommendations in the first report should be implemented by April 1987.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many self-employed people in Wales were in receipt of family income supplement at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: At the end of April 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, there were about 2,000 self-employed families in Wales receiving family income supplement.

NHS (Property Sales)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement regarding the use of resources released by the sale of surplus or redundant Health Service property with particular reference to mental institutions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government recognise that property represents one of the National Health Service's most valuable assets and must be managed efficiently in order to maximise the resources available for improvements in services to patients.

We now require Health Authorities to review regularly their property holdings and to identify for re-use or disposal those properties which are no longer required for their original purpose. Except in special circumstances, for example, where the disposal is made possible only by the provision of a new hospital from regional funds, funds released from the sale of surplus property should be retained by the local district health authority where they can be used for the benefit of local patients. We expect resources from the disposal of redundant mental hospitals to be used to develop better community based services for mentally ill patients and mentally handicapped people of the districts previously served.

District Health Authorities (Appointments)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement concerning his consultations with local authority associations on proposals for changes in the procedures governing the termination of local authority appointments to district health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 23 January 1985, c. 458]: An amendment to Regulation 5(3) of the National Health Service (Regional and District Health Authorities Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1983, requiring local authorities to obtain the consent of the Secretary of State for Social Services to the early termination of an appointment to a district health authority will be laid before the House on 16 July. Our officials have written to the local authority associations today informing them of this decision. Copies of the letter have been placed in the Library.

DEFENCE

Tornado Aircraft

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision on the attrition purchase of Tornados for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Butler: I hope a decision will be taken by the end of the summer.

RAF Personnel (Records)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the details of Royal Air Force airmen's records of service provided for the Director General of Defence Accounts, Worcester, by PMC Innsworth for the awards calculation are taken from personnel files and not from the computer at Innsworth.

Mr. Lee: The RAF personnel management centre provides Director General of Defence Accounts staff at Worcester with service details drawn from both computer and personnel file sources because some information that is needed to assess pensions is not yet shown on the relevant computer print. There are plans to make more use of computers in assessing RAF pensions.

Service Pensions

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department has taken to check Army pension awards.

Mr. Lee: Routine checks of Army pension awards in issue are carried out by the Army pensions office as a matter of normal procedure. Special checks are also carried out from time to time. A special check has recently been carried out on some 8,800 Army pensions. The possible need for further similar checks is under consideration.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the recently acknowledged 147 errors in service pensions relate solely to Royal Navy or Royal Marines awards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: No; of the 147 errors, 52 relate to Royal Navy and Royal Marine pensions, 91 to Army pensions and four to RAF pensions.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether errors have been discovered in Army pensions since his answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 65; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Since 15 April two cases have been discovered involving a significant error in the rate of pension in issue and corrective action is being taken. These were isolated cases which did not arise from any general defect in the system in use.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether errors in Royal Air Force pensions have been discovered on computerised records at Innsworth since his answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 65; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: None has been discovered.

Optical Equipment

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current value of his Department's order for optical equipment for the armed forces.

Mr. Butler [pursuant to his reply, 24 June 1985, c. 291]: During the Financial Year 1984-85, direct headquarters contracts and amendments to a value of nearly £38 million were placed for equipment classified under the code 373 (optical precision instruments and photographic equipment) of the standard industrial classification. Other optical equipment is classified under a SIC code for electronic equipment and cannot be separately identified.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Dairy Products

Mr. Corbett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the anticipated extra cost, to the United Kingdom and the European Community, of the decision taken by the Commission's dairy management committee on 13 June to increase the export subsidy on butter and other dairy products;

(2) what is the estimated extra tonnage of butter and other dairy products which the European Community expects to export as a result of the decision of the Commission's dairy management committee on 13 June to increase the export subsidy on butter and other dairy products.

Mr. MacGregor: Forecasts of the kind requested are not available. However, for the calendar year 1985 the Community budget provides for expenditure of 747 million ecu (£464 million) on export refunds on butter and butter oil at an estimated export volume of about 500,000 tonnes in butter equivalent. In the frist half of 1985 EEC exports of butter were depressed because the EEC offer prices have been well above prices obtaining on the world market. In proposing the recent increases in export refunds to the Management Committee for Milk and Milk Products on 13 June, the Commission said that these increases could be funded from within the existing budgetary provision.

Mr. Corbett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what, for each year since its introduction, has been (a) the amount and (b) the cost of export subsidies on butter and other dairy products by category provided by the European Community.

Mr. MacGregor: Not all the data are readily available in the form requested. For the period since 1973 the data available on the tonnage of butter and butter oil and of the other main dairy products exported from the European Community, together with the expenditure on all dairy product export refunds, are set out in the following tables:

Moulton Veterinary Inspection Centre

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he received during the consultation period concerning proposed closure of the Moulton veterinary inspection centre.

Mr. Jopling: I have received 96 representations specifically about the centre at Moulton.

Food (Aluminium Colouring)

Mr. Waller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will introduce regulations to prohibit the sale of food products containing aluminium colouring, except where it is used for the purpose of cake decoration;

(2) what representations he has received alleging danger to dialysis patients of consuming foods containing aluminium colouring.

Mr. Jopling: The Colouring Matter in Food Regulations 1973 prohibits the use of aluminium in food in the United Kingdom other than for the external coating of dragees and the decoration of sugar coated flour confectionery. The food advisory committee, which advises Ministers on the use and safety of food additives, is reviewing the levels and uses of colours, including aluminium, in foods. Although no specific representations have been received on the subject the effect of aluminium in dialysis patients has been taken into account by the committee on toxicity of chemicals in food, consumer products and the environment in advising the food advisory committee on the safety of aluminium in food.

Sugar

Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will compare the European Economic Community price of sugar with that on the world market; and if he will make a statement including the cost to (a) the consumer and (b) the taxpayer of the current EEC sugar regime.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 11 July 1985]: The European Community's effective support price for white sugar is currently 58·43 ecu/100 kg (£361·48/tonne). The London daily price for white sugar, which may be regarded as representative of the world price, was $US130 (£96·65) per tonne on 9 July 1985. The world sugar market is a residual and higly volatile one. Estimates of the cost of the current Community sugar regime to consumers could be attempted only by making hypothetical assumptions about the policy which would be pursued in its absence. The cost to the Community budget of the sugar regime in 1984 is provisionally estimated as 406·2 million ecu (about 235 million), net of levies paid by Community sugar producers towards the costs of storage and surplus disposal.

EMPLOYMENT

Trade Unions

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to introduce further reforms of the law affecting trade unions so as to provide additional protection for ordinary trade unionists against abuses by the union's officers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are considering what further steps might be taken to carry forward our successful programme of trade union reform. Having embarked on our plan to give proper and effective rights to union members, we must ensure that these rights are fully developed, so that they provide the ordinary member with the protection that he is entitled to enjoy in a free society.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a breakdown of the ethnic origin of people accepted for youth training schemes in the London borough of Waltham Forest.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the London borough of Waltham Forest, the number of entrants to the youth training scheme by ethnic origin for the three-month period April to June 1985 was as follows:

	Number
White	82
Black/African/Caribbean descent	12
Indian Sub Continent descent	9
Others	3
TOTAL	106

Disabled People

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many registered disabled people have been unemployed in each year from 1978; and if he will give a breakdown by category of disability.

Mr. Alan Clark: The numbers of unemployed registered disabled people, broken down by category of disability, for each year from 1978 to 1982 are as follows. Figures are for April of each year. Comprehensive figures for all unemployed registered disabled people have not been available since the introduction of voluntary registration in October 1982.

Since then, the figures for unemployed registered disabled people registered for work at jobcentres, with no breakdown by category of disability, have been collected quarterly. The total figures over that period which are, of course, not directly comparable with those in the table are:

Dependant Care (Paid Leave)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to seek to introduce a statutory right to paid leave of absence from work for persons who have to look after seriously ill dependants, including elderly parents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government firmly believe that matters such as these are best dealt with between employers and employees according to their own needs, priorities and circumstances, rather than by Government or Community intervention. The question of such leave, of course, is presently being discussed in Brussels under the draft EC directive on parental leave and leave for family reasons.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what conclusions he draws from the extent of correlation between the number of persons currently classified as unemployed and the number registered as available for work at a jobcentre; and what steps he intends to take to seek to ensure that only those genuinely seeking work are included in the unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: The monthly unemployment figures relate to claimants to unemployment benefits (that is unemployed benefit, supplementary allowances or national insurance credits) at unemployment benefit offices. Unemployed people are no longer required to register for work as a condition for receiving these benefits, and many unemployed claimants who do not register use the self-service facilities at jobcentres or other means of seeking work. Moreover, those registering at jobcentres include a number of people seeking a change of employment and others who are not claiming benefits. Conclusions about unemployment cannot therefore be drawn from the numbers currently registered at jobcentres. While it is a condition of receipt of unemployment benefits that a person be unemployed and capable and available for work, it is not possible to ensure that the monthly count of claimants includes only those actively seeking work. However, less frequent estimates of the numbers without jobs seeking work are available from the labour force survey based on household interviews, and these provide a check on the coverage of the monthly count. Provisional results for 1983, including both the number of claimants at unemployment benefit offices not actively seeking work and the number of non-claimants without jobs seeking work, were published in the August 1984 issue of the Employment Gazette. Similar comparisons for 1984 will be published shortly.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 82

SESSION 1984–85

1st July—12th July 1985

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
